PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 95th CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Monday, January 30, 1978

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Edward G. Latch, D.D., offered the following prayer:

He who would love life and see good days, let him turn away from evil and do right; let him seek peace and pursue it.—I Peter 3: 10, 11.

Almighty God and Father of us all, we come to Thee acknowledging our dependence upon Thee and offering unto Thee the devotion of our hearts. May the consciousness of Thy presence strengthen us by lifting us out of any discouragement we may have and by making us ready for the duties of these demanding days. Grant unto us wisdom and courage to fulfill the high positions of political prestige which are ours as leaders of our Nation. Let us not lose heart in our endeavors to work for the good of our people and the welfare of the whole human family.

Continue to bless our President, our Speaker, and Members of this House. Give them peace in their hearts and happiness in their homes as they seek to lead our Nation in the ways of justice, righteousness, and good will. Amen.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Chirdon, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the House of the following titles:

H.R. 2960. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to memorialize the fifty-six signers of the Declaration of Independence in Constitution Gardens in the District of Columbia; and

H.R. 5054. An act to repeal section 3306 of title 5, United States Code, to eliminate the requirement of apportionment of appointments in the departmental service in the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 2220. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to designate an Assistant Secretary to serve in his place as a member of the Library of Congress Trust Fund Board.

The message also announced that the Vice President, pursuant to section 1024 of title 15, United States Code, appointed Mr. McGOVERN to fill the vacancy of the majority party membership on the Joint Economic Committee.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

(Mr. UDALL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, the first order of business scheduled today was a motion I was planning to make to suspend the rules and pass the bill, S. 2076.

I just learned a few minutes ago that another committee, the great Committee on Education and Labor, has some questions about the bill and has a jurisdictional problem. In order to see if we can resolve this matter, I am not going to make that motion today, but we hope to have it resolved and bring the bill back on the floor at a later date.

RED CARNATIONS DENOTE CELEBRATION OF McKINLEY'S BIRTHDAY

(Mr. REGULA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. REGULA. Mr. Speaker, today we note the birthday of William McKinley, 25th President of the United States and the last Civil War veteran to be elected as President, by wearing the red carnation, the State flower of Ohio, and a great favorite of the martyred President.

William McKinley, who ably served the 16th District of Ohio for 13 years as a Member of this body, including 2 years as chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, had a distinguished career as a noted trial lawyer, Congressman, Governor of Ohio, and President from 1897 to 1901. He led the Nation through the Spanish-American War and the acquisition of vast overseas territories.

President McKinley shared a common political goal with our distinguished Speaker. His front porch campaign for reelection in 1900 emphasized his slogan, "Good work, good wages, good money and a full dinner pail." According to Congressional Insight in its January 13 publication this year, Speaker TIP O'NEILL's own priorities for the House will emphasize "work and wages." I would add that I hope our leader also adopts the third part of McKinley's platform and supports an anti-inflationary budget resolution that will maintain "good money" for the people of this Nation.

William McKinley was the first President to recognize the role of the United States as a world power. Speaking at the Pan-American Exposition in Buffalo in 1901, he said:

The period of exclusiveness is past—God and man have linked the nations together—isolation is no longer possible or desirable.

In closing, he continued:

Let us ever remember that our real eminence lies in victories of peace, not those of war, our earnest prayer is that God will graciously vouchsafe prosperity, happiness and peace to all our neighbors—and like blessings to all peoples and powers on earth.

In the gallery today we have Mayor James Puckett and the reigning carnation queen, Terry Kent, from Carnation City, Alliance, Ohio, who have graciously helped distribute the red carnations on Capitol Hill and to our First Lady, Rosalynn Carter. Also we have in the gallery Sandy Durham, chairman of the carnation queens pageant, and Jim Giordano, general chairman of the carnation week. The red carnations for today's observance were made possible through the generosity of one of Stark County's public-spirited citizens, Mr. Chet Keller, president of United Floral Co.

STORM-DRIVEN MIDWEST STATES SHOULD BE DECLARED DISASTER AREA

(Mr. LATTA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, I believe everybody in the country is aware of the tremendous disaster that has befallen several of the Midwestern States, particularly the States of Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, and Pennsylvania.

I was unable to get out to my district over the weekend. The Toledo airport was closed, and I could not have gotten into my district even if I had gotten to Toledo. Notwithstanding my inability to get back to the district, I have been in communication with the various county officials, State officials, and Federal officials attempting to assist in every way possible. One cannot imagine the magnitude of this disaster and the hardships people have endured and are still enduring. The President of the United States must recognize the magnitude of the disaster this horrendous snowstorm has inflicted upon our area. Yet, as I stand here before the membership, Mr. Speaker, the President has not declared this region a disaster area and has only placed us in a state of emergency. The benefits are not the same, as the Members are well aware, and these people need every benefit we can give them now! I ask the President to declare the region a disaster area forthwith!

STRIKE-CAUSED COAL SHORTAGE ADDS TO MIDWEST PROBLEMS

(Mr. DEVINE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DEVINE. Mr. Speaker, in conjunction with the remarks made by my colleague, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LATTA), in addition to the emergency situation brought about by the weather, there is the shortage of coal that has been caused by the continuing devastating strike on the part of the United Mine Workers.

We were in touch with the White House last week. We wrote letters urging the President to get off dead center and invoke the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act, which would send the miners back to work at least for 80 days during the cooling-off period.

When we talk about an energy shortage in this country, we should remember that we have millions and millions of tons of coal available if these miners would get back to work. We call upon the President publicly to invoke the provisions of Taft-Hartley to take care of this situation because electric power is being shut off for the absence of coal, and another crisis is upon us.

UNITED STATES SHOULD NOT SIDE WITH RHODESIAN TERRORISTS

(Mr. BAUMAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Speaker, I think it is highly regrettable that the United States should be engaged, together with Great Britain, in the meetings on the Island of Malta now taking place with acknowledged terrorists from Rhodesia, as happened over the weekend.

It is totally incomprehensible to me that the United States could side with these butchers who have slaughtered hundreds of blacks and whites in Rhodesia for the last 2 years.

Prime Minister Ian Smith is now engaged in what appears to be successful negotiations to bring about majority rule in Rhodesia. There is no place in those negotiations with the moderate black leaders for these kinds of Marxist butchers.

Again, it is strange to me that the United States should be exerting its will and using its resources to promote those who are pro-Communists and have shown no respect for the rights or lives of others.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that all of the Members saw the "60-Minutes" program last night on CBS, which gave for the first time, at least in my memory, a true picture of the racial accord that is being reached in Rhodesia. If we let them alone, Mr. Speaker, I think they will reach a peaceful solution of their own problems.

This report contains a description of the Council activities during the second quarter of 1977 in monitoring both prices and wages in the private sector and various Federal Government activities that lead to higher costs and prices without creating commensurate benefits. It discusses Council reports and analyses concerning the following matters: (1) the collective bargaining agreement reached in the steel industry; (2) the availability of home insulation materials; (3) prospects for a fertilizer shortage; (4) the prices of bakery products; (5) the price behavior of auto parts; and (6) U.S. production capacity of cement. The report also discusses the Council's filings before Federal regulatory agencies.

The Council on Wage and Price Stability will continue to play an important role in supplementing fiscal and monetary policies by calling public attention to wage and price developments or actions by the Government that could be of concern to American consumers.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 30, 1978.

AUTHORIZING APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE OFFICE OF RAIL PUBLIC COUNSEL

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5798) to amend the Interstate Commerce Act to authorize appropriations for the Office of Rail Public Counsel for fiscal year 1978.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. ROONEY).

The motion was agreed to.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 5798, with Mr. BENJAMIN in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. ROONEY) will be recognized for 30 minutes, and the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MADIGAN) will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. ROONEY).

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, this bill authorizes appropriations not to exceed $1 million for the Office of Rail Public Counsel in the Interstate Commerce Commission for fiscal year 1978.

An Office of Public Counsel was established within the Rail Services Planning Office of the ICC by the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973. Congress directed that this Office be established in order to assure that all communities and users of rail services, regardless of size or location, were adequately represented during the reorganization process of the bankrupt railroads of the Northeast. Reportedly, the Office developed a highly successful mechanism for people affected by the rail reorganization to complain about the negative impact the reorganization plans caused by submitting the most persuasive evidence and arguments to further their interest. In light of this record, Congress decided that it was important to continue and expand this public representation especially as there are a number of very important decisions affecting railroad policies to be made in implementing the Railroad Revitalization and Regulatory Reform Act of 1976. Therefore, provision for the establishment of an independent office, called the Office of Rail Public Counsel, was included in the Railroad Revitalization and Regulatory Reform Act of 1976, which was enacted February 5, 1976.

In considering H.R. 5798, the committee recognized that Congress may desire to establish a consumer representation agency during this session. Nevertheless, the committee wishes to emphasize that the funding for the already established Office of Rail Public Counsel should not await the establishment of a consumer representation agency. Failure to timely fund the Office of Rail Public Counsel could cause considerable harm to the many communities in the country that are presently considering actions necessary for the continuation or abandonment of rail lines.

In the event a consumer representation agency is established, it is the intent of this committee to reconsider the matter of a Rail Public Counsel, and to determine at that time, whether the Office should be continued separately or included within the activities of the newly established representation agency. The committee will wish to determine whether the representation agency has the same degree of independence and whether it would be preferable for the Office of Rail Public Counsel to be included in the consumer representation agency, so that all the functions be conducted in a uniform manner. The committee, however, believes that this matter should be decided when the consumer representation agency is established and not at this time. Further, the administration obviously recognizes that that Office of Rail Public Counsel should be funded at this time and not await the establishment of a consumer representation agency as evidenced by the fact that the current budget provides $700,000 for the Office of Rail Public Counsel during fiscal year 1978.

The Congress is already on record that the Office of Rail Public Counsel should be established immediately. The 1976 Rail Act, which established the Office of Rail Public Counsel, provided that the President was to appoint a Director of the Office within 60 days after the enactment of the act. That is, a Director should have been appointed by April 6, 1976. Unfortunately, this appointment was not made by President Ford. President Carter, however, has appointed a Director, who was confirmed by the Senate last December and is presently establishing the Office.

The committee believes that the $1 million authorized by this bill is very reasonable. The amount compares favorably with the fact that for fiscal year 1977, and the transition quarter, Congress authorized and appropriated $2 million for the Office. None of this amount has been expended, however, because as I just indicated, there was no Director during that time. The committee does not believe that it is necessary to again authorize $2 million because there will be insufficient time for the Office to get organized and utilize the extensive staff originally contemplated.

The difference between the $1 million authorized by this bill and the $800,000 already appropriated for this Office represents an amount that may be necessary for certain contingencies. The committee believes that the difference between these two amounts is reasonable considering that there has been very little experience in the types of activities that are going to be undertaken.

Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from West Virginia (Mr. STAGGERS).

Mr. STAGGERS. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding and I rise in support of H.R. 5798, a bill which authorizes an appropriation of $1 million for fiscal year 1978 to enable the Office of Rail Public Counsel to perform its statutory duties for the fiscal year 1978. An appropriation in the amount of $800,000 has already been made for the Office for this fiscal year.

In section 304(a) of the Railroad Revitalization and Regulatory Reform Act of 1976, Congress established the Office as an independent entity within the Interstate Commerce Commission to present the views of the public and represent the public interest in rail transportation matters subject to the Commission's jurisdiction. Prior to this congressional action, a similar administrative entity was created in 1974 by the Director of the Rail Services Planning Organization to assist shippers and communities in participating in aspects of the regional rail reorganization process affecting them. Recognition of the significant value of public participation in the reorganization process led to the statutory establishment of the Office of Rail Public Counsel, with expanded powers.

Mr. Chairman, President Carter has recently appointed the first Director of the Office of Rail Public Counsel, who has been confirmed by the Senate. Hopefully, the new Director will soon assume a leadership role in insuring active public participation and representation in the decisionmaking process at a time when decisions that affect the future of rail service in the United States are being made by the Commission, and other Federal agencies.

For these reasons, I urge passage of the bill.

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I support this bill which provides $1 million authorization for the Office of Rail Public Counsel.

This bill provides the necessary $1 million authorization to fund the Office of Rail Public Counsel. As you know, I have repeatedly expressed my concern—which is shared by Mr. SKUBITZ and many others in this body—that the Office of Rail Public Counsel was an unwise provision of the 4–R Act. It was unwise because it covers only rail matters before the ICC and does not apply to pipelines, motor carriers, or water carriers. If the idea of a Rail Public Counsel is a good one, it should apply to all modes of transportation.

As you also know, nearly 2 years elapsed before the executive branch sent a nominee to be the Rail Public Counsel. Finally last December a Rail Public Counsel was nominated and confirmed by the Senate. I would hope that the new Rail Public Counsel uses the powers of his Office to strengthen the railroad industry rather than to harass it. It is important for this Nation to have a strong railroad system. For too long public policy has so hamstrung the industry that it has a rate of return on investment of only 1.8 percent, and the bankruptcies of the Northeast have spread to the Midwest.

I support the passage of this bill and hope that the money it authorizes will be wisely used.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Chairman, it is my pleasure to rise in support of Mr. ROONEY's bill, H.R. 5798, to amend the Interstate Commerce Act to authorize a $1 million appropriation for the Office of Rail Public Counsel for fiscal year 1978.

For too long, the only interests well represented in ICC rail proceedings were those of shippers and carriers, whose immediate interests were effected by the outcome of individual and rulemaking proceedings. Unheard before the Commission were the voices of the ultimate consumers of transportation services—such as small businessmen and members of the general public.

In 1974, it was discovered that this need not be so. As part of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973, Congress established a public counsel function in the Commission's Rail Services Planning Office to assist the public in the development of a plan to restructure the financially ailing or bankrupt northeast railroads. To the surprise of some, the Public Counsel and his staff were able to add much valuable information to the public docket through its representation of the views of affected communities and the general public.

Both Congress and the ICC recognized the validity of continuing at least some of the functions of the Office of Public Counsel and each moved to provide for such an Office at the Commission. Of the two, Congress acted more boldly and in 1976 we established, as part of the Railroad Revitalization Regulatory Reform Act, the Office of Public Counsel, giving it a considerable degree of independence.

Under section 304, the Office of Rail Public Counsel, among other things has standing to become a party to any Commission railroad proceeding; it may petition the ICC for the initiation of rail proceedings; seek judcial review of any ICC railroad action; gather, analyze and present the views of communities and users rail service effected by Commission proceedings; and otherwise represent the public interest wherever Federal policies and activities that effect rail transportation matters subject to Commission jurisdiction are involved. The Director of this Office, according to section 304, is to be appointed by the President with the advance and consent of the Senate.

Unfortunately, until very recently the Office was left unfilled by the White House. This action left the public without a valuable means of input in the ICC decisionmaking process, despite the fact that funding was authorized for the Office for fiscal years 1976 and 1977.

The negative results of this action were directly felt by New England and New York Farmers Associations, which in 1973 petitioned the ICC to investigate rail freight rates covering the transport of feed grains to New England. Results of the Commission's investigation were published in February 1977. The Commission found that, although some of the rates protested must be corrected, it was unable to document discrimination against New England feed grain recipients because of limited investigatory resources. A joint concurring opinion presented by ICC Chairman Daniel O'Neal and Vice Chairman Clapp highlighted this point. They stated, while they concurred that the record did not allow the Commission to conclude that New England feed producers suffered as a result of additional rates, disparities, and distortions, these findings were "only too predictable, given the fact that no Commission staff unit was assigned to aid in developing an adequate evidentiary record."

The Commissioners further stated that—

> Considering the broad competition and other economic issues involved and the complicated cost questions presented, this is the type of case that calls out for more than a passive judgment upon an incomplete adversary record which we are now able to render.

In other words, participation in this kind of case by an Office of Rail Public Counsel would have produced a better considered judgment.

In May 1977, 16 Congressmen, including myself, wrote President Carter, directing his attention to this grain rates decision and strongly urged Mr. Carter to immediately nominate a Director of the Office of Rail Public Counsel.

I am pleased to state that in November 1977 such a nomination was made and that it was an excellent one.

The President's nominee, who was recently confirmed by the Senate, is Attorney Howard A. Heffron. Mr. Heffron left a lucrative private practice to return to Government service. He brings to this post 25 years of rich legal experience, including service as Chief Counsel to the Federal Highway Adminstration from 1967 to 1969.

As his numerous legal writings indicate, Mr. Heffron is both a scholar and a strong consumer advocate. Therefore, it appears that the public interest will be ably represented before the Commission.

It is essential that there be no further delay in implementing the Office of Rail Public Counsel. Approval of the authorization sought here for fiscal 1978 will allow Mr. Heffron, at last, to begin the work long needed in this area.

Therefore, I strongly urge passage of H.R. 5798, which is totally consistent with our past actions.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 5798, whch authorizes an appropriation of $1,000,000 for the Office of Rail Public Counsel in the Interstate Commerce Commission for fiscal year 1978.

This office was established in section 304(a) of the Railroad Revitalization and Regulatory Reform Act of 1976. I understand that the President has failed to date to appoint a Director to this office subsequent to the enactment of this legislation.

I support this appropriation because of the need for public oversight within the ICC. The Office, as established in the legislation of 1976, is charged with presenting the views of the public and representing the public and representing the public interest with respect to rail transportation.

Mr. Chairman, I submit that the experiences in my own part of New York State point to the crying need for this Counsel.

The Poughkeepsie Rail bridge, spanning the Hudson River, was the only rail link between New England and the rest of the Nation. The rail traffic on that bridge was halted by fire in May 1974. Commonsense dictates that speedy repair of the bridge was imperative not only for the economic well-being of southeastern New York and southern New England, but for national security as well. With the Poughkeepsie Bridge out of service, all rail traffic has been routed through the Selkirk rail yards near Albany, many miles to the north. This situation would be ludicrous were it not so tragic to the rail shippers of the area. Yet, ConRail consistently refuses to rectify the situation.

I have conducted several public hearings in my own congressional district. Most recently a hearing which I cochaired with my colleagues Mr. MOFFETT, Mr. FISH, and Mr. MCHUGH. At each of these hearings, scores of rail shippers, civic groups, and interested citizens pointed out the facts and figures which underscore the need for the repair of the Poughkeepsie Rail Bridge. Yet, ConRail consistently refuses to act.

The New York State Department of Transportation, the Connecticut Department of Transportation, and the Governor of the State of Connecticut have all strongly urged the repair of this vital transportation link. Still, ConRail turns a deaf ear to the logical pleadings of the people.

In addition, we have recently been horrified to learn of the massive abandonment of many rail lines in the Northeast. ConRail seems to be hell bent on exerting its independence and remaining aloof from the needs and desires of the public.

Mr. Chairman, I feel that the establishment of this Counsel is a must if our rail companies are going to see fit to run roughshod over the wants of the people.

I understand that the President is prepared to appoint the Director and other officials necessary for the functioning of this agency once we approve this legislation. Accordingly, I urge my colleagues, in the interest of progressive responsiveness to our rail users and the general public, to approve this appropriation for this most essential agency.

Mr. SKUBITZ. Mr. Chairman, I support this bill which provides a $1 million authorization for the Office of Rail Public Counsel. Having stated my support for the bill, I want to restate some of the difficulties inherent in the Office of Rail Public Counsel concept.

First, as you will recall, the Office of Rail Public Counsel was established under the 4–R Act when it was signed into law 2 years ago. At that time, I pointed out that it was nonsense to have a public counsel at the ICC concerned only with rail matters. Prior to the 4–R Act, the Commission itself had suggested the creation of an Office of Public Counsel which would have represented the public with respect to all modes of transportation under the jurisdiction of the Commission. Because of the jurisdictional limitations of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the public counsel concept was applied only to those matters before the Commission relating to railroads.

I continue to believe that we should either eliminate the Office of Rail Public Counsel or create an Office of Public Counsel which could serve the public with respect to trucks and water carriers as well as railroads. In my judgment, we are again discriminating against railroads and in favor of trucks and water carriers by failing to expand the jurisdiction of the office.

Second, for nearly the full 2 years that the Office of Rail Public Counsel has been established by law, there has been no activity because we waited and waited for a Rail Public Counsel to be appointed. Finally, the President sent an appointment to the Congress and that appointment has been confirmed by the Senate. I was disturbed by the delay in carrying out the law even though I have never been enthusiastic about the ability of the office to protect the public interest.

Third, I would hope that the Office of Rail Public Counsel would begin to represent the public in matters considered by the Commission. In my judgment, that public interest is best served at this time by the counsel vigorously supporting measures which will strengthen the railroad industry. As you know, Mr. Chairman, we have the problem of bankrupt railroads operating in the Midwest. We have the problems of ConRail failing to meet the expectations that we had for it just a short 2 years ago. We have rail passenger service deteriorating daily even though we are pouring millions of Federal dollars into Amtrak. We have quite frankly the need for public counsel to vigorously push for more favorable conditions in order for railroads to gain the necessary strength for this Nation to have a viable transportation system.

I support this bill, Mr. Chairman, and I am hopeful that the newly appointed Rail Public Counsel will push vigorously to see that railroads are given at least a fair shake before the regulatory bodies which have thus far nearly succeeded in toppling our entire industry.

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time.

The CHAIRMAN. If there are no further requests for time, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 5798

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 27(6) of the Interstate Commerce Act (49 U.S.C. 26b(6)) is amended—

(1) by striking out "and" immediately after "1976,"; and

(2) by inserting immediately before the period at the end thereof the following: ", and not to exceed $1,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1978".

Mr. ROONEY (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be printed in the RECORD, and that it be open for amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any amendments?

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I just would like to mention to the House here that this bill dealing with the Office of Rail Public Counsel will be coming to our attention again next week when we debate a bill to create an Office of Consumer Representation. I and the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. LEACH) will be offering a substitute to that consumer bill which takes a different approach to better consumer representation, and as a part of that bill we are attempting to strengthen a unit such as the Rail Public Counsel without creating a central agency. I bring this to the attention of the chairman here as well as to the Members of the House.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any amendments? If not, under the rule the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. MCKAY) having assumed the chair, Mr. BENJAMIN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 5798) to amend the Interstate Commerce Act to authorize appropriations for the Office of Rail Public Counsel for fiscal year 1978, pursuant to House Resolution 633, he reported the bill back to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. MOTTL. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 318, nays 44, not voting 70, as follows:

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill H.R. 5798.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION FOR SUBCOMMITTEE ON ADVANCED ENERGY TECHNOLOGIES AND ENERGY CONSERVATION RESEARCH, DEVELOPMENT AND DEMONSTRATION OF COMMITTEE ON SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY TO SIT TODAY WHILE HOUSE IS IN SESSION

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Advanced Energy Technologies and Energy Conservation Research, Development and Demonstration of the Committee on Sicence and Technology may be permitted to meet at 2 o'clock today, notwithstanding the fact that the House is in session.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

REQUIRING CONRAIL TO MAKE PREMIUM PAYMENTS UNDER CERTAIN MEDICAL AND LIFE INSURANCE PLANS

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5646) to amend the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 to require ConRail to make premium payments under certain medical and life insurance policies, to provide that ConRail shall be entitled to a loan under section 211(h) of such act in an amount required for such premium payments, and to provide that such premium payments shall be deemed to be expenses of administration of the respective railroads in reorganization.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. ROONEY).

The motion was agreed to.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 5646, with Mr. BENJAMIN in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. ROONEY) will be recognized for 30 minutes, and the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MADIGAN) will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. ROONEY).

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, this bill provides authority whereby the U.S. Railway Association can loan funds to ConRail for the purpose of making premium payments on medical and life insurance policies for noncontract preconveyance retirees of the bankrupt railroads. The retirement program for these retirees provided that these insurance benefits would be continued by the railroad after retirement. This bill therefore merely provides that this provision in the retirement program be carried out. These persons worked and retired with the understanding that these benefits would be continued to be paid after retirement by the railroad. We want to make sure now, when the retirees are not in a position to make alternative arrangements, that the original commitment is fulfilled by the estate of the bankrupt railroad.

Last year, I was successful in having the Rail Transportation Improvement Act amended to provide, among other things, basically the same provisions as are in this bill. I offered the amendment at that time because I was informed that the health and life insurance protection for these preconveyance retirees were to cease as neither the estates nor ConRail was required to continue payment, and did not intend to voluntarily continue payment. I believed then, and continue to believe, that depriving these persons of these benefits would be an injustice that should not be tolerated.

Shortly after the enactment of the Rail Transportation Improvement Act, the estate of one of the bankrupt railroads went to court arguing that, despite the provision in the act, they should not have to continue to pay health and life insurance benefits to these retirees because the premiums did not meet the prerequisite of coming within the definition of an administrative expense. The court in the case brought by the Erie-Lackawanna agreed with the position of the estate. The court indicated that the act clearly states that pensions are an administrative expense but with regard to health and life insurance premiums the act provides they are to be paid only if they are deemed to be an administrative expense. This bill therefore is designed to overcome this adverse decision by correcting the deficiency in the drafting of the Rail Transportation Improvement Act.

It should be noted that the premiums for these policies are to be paid in the same manner as all other preconveyance claims. That is, the USRA loans funds to ConRail which makes the payment, and in turn, collects a like amount from the bankrupt estate. These funds are then repaid to USRA. There is no cost to the Government because the funds are loaned by USRA at an interest rate slightly higher than the interest rate paid by the Government to borrow the funds.

At this time, it is not clear as to exactly how much will have to be loaned for the purpose of paying these premiums. The reason it is not clear is that it is not known whether payment will be made on a single premium basis or a number of payments made extending over the life of the retirees. Moreover, it is also not known whether or not Penn Central intends to pay the premiums directly itself or to have ConRail make the payment from the loan funds. Assuming that Penn Central is included in the program, the total number of retirees involved would be 3,859, and the total loan to ConRail is estimated, on a single premium basis, at $33.2 million. On the other hand, if Penn Central is not included, only 1,073 retirees would be involved and the amount of the loan is estimated at $10.7 million. In any event, the committee understands that there are sufficient funds available at USRA under the previous authorization to make loans for that purpose.

In conclusion, it should be remembered that the bill does nothing more than has already been done for contract retirees, and all retirees with regard to their pensions—these benefits are part of the pension and should be considered in the same way in the act.

Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from West Virginia (Mr. STAGGERS).

Mr. STAGGERS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 5646. This bill amends section 303 (b) (6) of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 to require ConRail to make premium payments necessary for the continuation of certain medical and life insurance coverage for preconveyance noncontract retirees of the bankrupt railroads whose assets have been transferred to ConRail. The retirees are legally entitled to these insurance benefits by reason of their prior service with the railroads but face the prospect of permanently losing the benefits due to the bankruptcy of their former employers. Loss of this insurance coverage could work severe financial hardship on many of the retirees who are living on fixed incomes.

Mr. Chairman, in cases where insurance coverage has lapsed as a result of nonpayment of premiums, ConRail is required to obtain similar coverage for the retirees and to pay claims thas would have been paid by the insurer but for the lapse of coverage.

The bill also provides that ConRail shall be entitled to a loan under section 211(h) of the 3–R Act from the U.S. Railway Association to fund the insurance coverage. Conrail, in turn, will have claims against each of the estates of the railroads to the extent of funds expended on their behalf to meet their obligations to their former employees. It is anticipated that a very substantial portion of these funds ultimately will be repaid.

Mr. Chairman, it should be noted that Congress recognized the human needs at stake here and attempted to accomplish the same goals intended by this bill in section 203 of the Rail Transportation Improvement Act of 1976. However, the reorganization court held in the Erie Lackawanna case that these particular obligations do not have administrative claim status and, therefore, were not eligible for section 211(h) loans. To correct this deficiency, H.R. 5646 provides that these obligations shall be deemed to be expenses of administration of the estates of the railroads.

For these reasons, I urge passage of the bill.

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, as you know, when this bill was reported from the committee, Mr. COLLINS filed minority views which were directed at the bad precedent established in the practice of permitting loans under section 211(h). It is clear that under normal bankruptcy procedure, claims such as those under H.R. 5646 would be routine business transactions and not entitled to have the highest claim against the asset. I support this provision because I feel strongly the retired individuals involved should not suffer. However, I believe that the drafting difficulties in this legislation should be noted, and it should be made clear that the Congress has no intention to unconstitutionally erode the estates.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LUNDINE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 5646, legislation that will provide for payment of the life and medical insurance premiums of certain retired railroad workers.

Last year, I had the privilege to submit my statement to the Subcommittee on Transportation and Commerce. My strong support of this bill arises from the unjust predicament in which many railroad retirees in my district in the Southern Tier of New York State find themselves.

These retired workers have faced a confusing and disappointing situation for many months. In June of 1976, the special court established by the Regional Rail Reorganization Act dismissed the petitions of the trustees of the bankrupt railroad estates to require ConRail to assume responsibility for life insurance premiums. However, the reorganization court did authorize the trustees of these estates to continue payment of the premiums but only through September 1976. After that date, many of the affected retirees were required to begin paying the entire premium in order to keep their insurance plans in force. This unanticipated financial burden has been a source of enormous hardship for many retired railroad workers because of their limited incomes and their inability to easily obtain comparable coverage elsewhere.

The legislation now before us would require ConRail to pay for these insurance premiums as expenses of administration of the respective estates of the railroads in reorganization and would thereby precipitate the release of the necessary loan funds by the U.S. Railway Association.

H.R. 5646 provides the vehicle to correct a serious injustice and to make a positive impact on the lives of retired individuals who have contributed many valuable years to the railroad industry. I urge my colleagues to support this bill.

Mr. SKUBITZ. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the passage of H.R. 5646. This bill pertains to the correction of another loose end involving the creation of ConRail. As you know, the 4–R Act established ConRail as part of the reorganization of the bankrupt railroads in the Northeast.

One of the mechanisms used to facilitate the creation of ConRail was the use of loans by the Government in order to make certain payments which eventually will be taken care of by the estates of the bankrupt railroads. The claims that are covered by subsection 211(h) of the 4–R Act are claims which have a special status either because of commitments made by the U.S. Government during the last days of the bankrupt railroads' operations or claims affecting the employees of the affected railroads.

In the original 4–R Act, we were careful to make sure that contract employees—the members of the brotherhoods—were amply protected by this provision. Unfortunately, we were not cognizant of the fact that certain employees who were not members of the union could also be adversely affected in having benefits delayed. The purpose of this bill is simply to make sure that some 4,000 employees of the various railroads do not lose supplemental health or life insurance benefits. The estates of the bankrupt railroads will eventually have to pay this cost but in the interim, 211(h) money can be used in order to alleviate any possible hardship to these men and women who have been caught up in the reorganization process through no fault of their own. As you know, Mr. Chairman, 211(h) provides for a revolving fund so that no additional appropriation will be needed as a result of this legislation. USRA will, from time to time, be able to obtain money from the estates in order to replenish that which has been loaned out under section 211(h).

In my judgment, the passage of this bill corrects an inadvertent inequity and I support its passage.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 5646, a bill requiring ConRail to make premium payments under certain medical and life insurance plans.

This measure amends the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 for the purpose of requiring ConRail to assume obligations of the estates of now-bankrupt railroads so that medical and life insurance coverage will continue for employees who retired prior to the date the assets of these railroads were transferred to ConRail.

As the committee report accompanying H.R. 5646 indicates:

These retirees are legally entitled to the insurance benefits in question by reason of their prior service with the railroads but face the prospect of permanently losing such benefits due to the bankruptcy of their former employees. This loss could result in severe financial hardship for many of these individuals who are living on fixed incomes and could secure this insurance coverage only at substantial personal expense, if at all.

A number of my colleagues have portrayed the untenable financial situation into which constituents of theirs have been thrown due to the bankruptcy of major railroad corporations. Rail workers in my district, too, are facing this same crisis. For example, Ralph Van Inwegen of Hugenot, N.Y., relates that the failure of ConRail to pick up the employer's share of his $11,500 life insurance policy will jack up his insurance premium from $126.33 to $188.40.

Many other individuals—and, for that matter, municipalities owed back taxes by the bankrupt railroads—are suffering unfairly from the financial collapse of what were some of this Nation's major railroads.

Accordingly, I urge my colleagues to support H.R. 5646, so that we may remedy a serious inequity caused by the bankruptcy of these railroads.

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 5646

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That paragraph (6) of section 303(b) of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (45 U.S.C. 743(b)(6)) is amended—

(1) by redesignating such paragraph (6) as paragraph (6)(A), and by redesignating clauses (A) and (B) in the first sentence thereof as clauses (i) and (ii), respectively; and

(2) by adding at the end thereof the following new subparagraph:

"(B) The Corporation shall make such premium payments as are necessary to maintain in effect all insurance policies providing medical or life insurance benefits to persons described in section 211(h)(1)(viii) of this Act, and shall be entitled to a loan pursuant to section 211(h) of this Act in an amount required for such premium payments. For purposes of such section 211(h) and notwithstanding any other provision of Federal or State law, amounts required for such premium payments shall be deemed to be expenses of administration of the respective estates of the railroads in reorganization.".

Mr. ROONEY (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered as read, printed in the RECORD, and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE AMENDMENT

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 2, strike out lines 7 through 17, inclusive, and insert the following:

"(B) The Corporation shall make such premium payments as may be necessary to maintain in effect any medical or life insurance policy which was maintained by a railroad in reorganization immediately prior to April 1, 1976, and which provides insurance benefits to individuals who retired, prior to April 1, 1976, from service with such a railroad. With respect to any such individual whose medical or life insurance coverage lapsed after April 1, 1976, due to nonpayment of premiums, the Corporation shall—

"(i) through the purchase of insurance or otherwise, provide medical or life insurance benefits of the same type and at the same or approximately the same level as were provided by the employer railroad in reorganization and in effect with respect to such individual immediately prior to April 1, 1976; and

"(ii) assume and pay any claim for such individual (or his personal representative) for any such insurance benefits, if—

"(I) such claim arose during the period beginning April 1, 1976, and ending on the date insurance coverage is provided pursuant to clause (i) of this subparagraph; and

"(II) such benefits were not paid by an insurer solely because of the lapse of the insurance coverage during such period.

The Corporation shall be entitled to a loan pursuant to section 211(h) of this Act in an amount required for the payment of insurance premiums and benefits described in this subparagraph. For purposes of such section 211(h) and notwithstanding any other provision of Federal or State law, amounts required for the payment of such premiums and benefits shall be deemed to be expenses of administration of the respective estates of the railroads in reorganization, due and payable as of April 1, 1976.".

Mr. ROONEY (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. ROONEY TO THE COMMITTEE AMENDMENT

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROONEY to the committee amendment: Page 4, strike out line 3 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "of April 1, 1976, or, in the case of a railroad in reorganization which is not subject to a bankruptcy proceeding, such amounts shall be deemed to be obligations of such railroad, due and payable as of such date, and shall be reimbursable in accordance with the procedures set forth in paragraphs (4) and (5) of such section 211(h). As used in this subparagraph, the term 'railroad in reorganization' includes any railroad which is controlled by a railroad in reorganization but is not itself subject to a bankruptcy proceeding, if such railroad conveyed substantially all of its rail properties to the Corporation pursuant to paragraph (1) of this subsection and conducted operations over such rail properties to the date of such conveyance,".

Mr. ROONEY (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment to the committee amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHARIMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. ROONEY) is recognized for 5 minutes in support of his amendment.

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Chairman, this amendment constitutes a relatively minor change to this bill. It has been brought to my attention that there is a railroad in existence called the Pennsylvania-Reading Seashore Lines, which was separately operated, but was controlled by the Reading Co. and the Penn Central Transportation Co. This railroad is not in reorganization, but most of its property was conveyed to ConRail pursuant to the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973. It has 13 retired employees, who presently are not receiving life insurance benefits, but who would receive benefits if this amendment is adopted. The trustees of the Reading Co. have informed me that in order for the same benefits to be granted to these employees, as will be given to the retired employees of the other railroads which have conveyed most of their property to ConRail, this amendment is required.

I am sure that my colleagues will agree that 13 additional employees should not be denied these benefits, because of a technicality in the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. ROONEY) to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment, as amended.

The committee amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there further amendments?

If not, under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BENJAMIN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 5646) to amend the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 to require ConRail to make premium payments under certain medical and life insurance policies, to provide that ConRail shall be entitled to a loan under section 211(h) of such act in an amount required for such premium payments, and to provide that such premium payments shall be deemed to be expenses of administration of the respective railroads in reorganization, pursuant to House Resolution 632, he reported the bill back to the House with sundry amendments adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 314, nays 50, not voting 68, as follows:

PROVIDING FOR EMERGENCY DROUGHT RELIEF MEASURES

Mr. MEEDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H.R. 10532) to amend Public Law 95–18, providing for emergency drought relief measures, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I was not able to attend the full Interior Committee meeting last week when this legislation was reported; but I understand, of course, the general principle of extending the drought relief program. The thing that does concern me, is that it is my understanding the legislation does not contain any cutoff date, that it is on open ended authorization. Why is that, and is this consistent with our budgetary procedure?

Mr. MEEDS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAUMAN. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Washington.

Mr. MEEDS. Mr. Speaker, this bill H.R. 10532 is an emergency measure to amend the act of April 7, 1977, as amended, to provide temporary authority to the Secretary of the Interior to facilitate measures to mitigate the effect of the drought of 1976–77. The only effect that the bill has is to extend for the time needed the period in which the Secretary can make payments for work performed under contracts entered into prior to September 30, 1977.

The act as it now stands requires that all work performed under its terms be completed by January 31, 1978. Due to labor problems, delayed delivery of construction materials, adverse weather conditions, and other factors not within the control of the contractors, there remains to be completed about $8,000,000 in important construction work on 22 separate Federal reclamation projects and 27 Indian tribal irrigation projects.

The measure authorizes no additional appropriations and, indeed, the funds involved have already been obligated. If we do not pass this bill in a timely manner the funds already expended will be to all intents and purposes wasted as many of the contractors do not have alternate sources of financing.

There is no known opposition to the measure in the committee and I understand that the Senate will take our bill immediately on its passage by the House. I strongly urge immediate adoption of this measure.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Speaker, these projects have already begun and are underway and this is only for their completion?

Mr. MEEDS. That is correct.

Mr. BAUMAN. Am I correct also that the reason these projects have been delayed in construction, in many instances, is because of excessive rain which has removed the excessive drought conditions?

Mr. MEEDS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, the gentleman is correct. Some projects, particularly in California, have because of adverse weather conditions. Of course, that may alleviate the drought problems today for this year, but in the future these programs could be used in the event we had another drought.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman. I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

H.R. 10532

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That cause (a) of the first section of the Act of April 7, 1977, entitled "An Act to provide temporary authorities to the Secretary of the Interior to facilitate emergency actions to mitigate the impacts of the 1976–1977 drought" (91 Stat. 36), as amended, is hereby further amended by adding after "January 31, 1978;" the following: "Provided further, That where the Secretary finds that such construction activities have been diligently pursued but cannot be completed by January 31, 1978, due to bad weather, delays in delivery of required supplies, or other unanticipated and unavoidable circumstances, the Secretary is authorized to allow continuation and completion of construction for a reasonable time beyond January 31, 1978".

SEC. 2. Section 7 of such Act is amended by striking out "March" and substituting in lieu thereof "May".

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. STAGGERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill H.R. 5646, previously passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. CHAPPELL. Mr. Speaker, on rollcall No. 19 I was unavoidably detained in my office. Had I been present, I would have voted "yea."

THE CARRYOVER SIMPLIFICATION AMENDMENTS OF 1978

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. STEIGER) is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. STEIGER. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill to deal with a number of problems which have been brought to my attention concerning the carryover basis provisions of the Tax Reform Act of 1976. Both the American Bankers Association and the American Bar Association as well as many attorneys and trust officers throughout Wisconsin have raised objections about these complicated changes in the Federal estate law. I agree that the law is unnecessarily complex, but I am as yet not persuaded that the answer is to repeal carryover basis. The bill I am introducing is designed to correct most of the problems without repealing an important tax reform.

Prior to enactment of the 1976 act, property passing from a decedent generally received a stepped-up or stepped-down basis equal to its value at the decedent's death for purposes of determining gain or loss on a sale or exchange of the property by the decedent's heir or beneficiary.

In reviewing this rule in connection with the 1976 act, the Congress believed that the stepped-up basis rule resulted in inequitable treatment between the estates and heirs of decedents who had accumulated wealth through taxable earnings and the estates and heirs of decedents who accumulated wealth through unrealized appreciation in assets. In the latter case, the unrealized appreciation accruing before death was never subjected to an income tax because the heir's or beneficiary's basis for determining gain was stepped-up to the value at the decedent's death. Moreover, in my opinion, there was an unwarranted distinction between deathtime and lifetime transfers, because a donor's basis in property was generally carried over for purposes of determining gain or loss upon a sale or exchange by a donee.

The carryover basis provisions adopted by the 1976 act were intended to address these basic issues. However, the provision as adopted does raise serious administrative and compliance problems for executors, heirs, and beneficiaries, and the Internal Revenue Service. The burden is especially acute in the case of small and modest-sized estates. I believe that a number of changes can be made to substantially resolve the legitimate complaints involving the administrative problems and complexities and yet retain the basic reform embodied in the carryover basis provision. My bill contains a number of amendments which would achieve this objective.

My bill eliminates small- and moderate-sized estates from coverage under the carryover basis rules. It is in these cases where the burden of the rule has the most severe impact, because of the absence of adequate basis records and the compliance cost relative to the size of the estate. An outright exception would be provided for an estate consisting of $175,000 or less of carryover basis property. The $175,000 roughly approximates the exemption equivalent of the estate and gift tax unified credit when it is fully phased in by 1981. In these cases, the basis of assets would be stepped up as under prior law and no special reporting by the executor would be required. As a result of this change, it is estimated that only about the largest 2 percent of estates would have to comply with the carryover basis rules. In those remaining cases where the carryover basis rules would apply, the minimum basis adjustment would be increased from the $60,000 under present law to $175,000. Further, in order to simplify computations, this adjustment would be made before the adjustment provided for death taxes attributable to appreciation.

The 1976 act contained an exemption for $10,000 in personal and household effects to deal with the serious problems an executor would face in attempting to ascertain the decedent's bases for these assets. Experience with the new law indicates that the exemption level is inadequate in many cases. My bill would increase the exemption to $25,000.

Also, a number of problems have been brought to my attention concerning the basis adjustment for death taxes attributable to appreciation. This adjustment was designed to eliminate the inequity and possibly confiscatory level of taxation which would arise if the full amount of appreciation were subject to an estate tax and then subject to an income tax based on the appreciation without taking into account the estate tax paid. My bill would substantially simplify this adjustment and make it more equitable. The death tax adjustment would generally be made on the basis of the highest marginal estate tax rate rather than the average rate as under present law. This approach would provide substantially the same treatment for estates and heirs where assets had been retained until death as is the case for estates where assets are sold before death and the income tax liability incurred reduces the estate tax liability at the highest estate tax marginal rates. Under the bill, a simple percentage will be taken from the estate tax rate table and applied to the appreciation. The percentage will be the highest rate to which the estate is subject before credits are taken into account. However, the next highest percentage would be used if less than $50,000 were in the highest bracket. In this way, the need to make recomputations for audit adjustments will be minimized.

Since the death tax adjustment would be based on Federal rates before taking the credit for State death taxes into account, no separate adjustment for State death taxes would be required to be computed. Thus, the three possible death tax adjustments for Federal estate taxes, State death taxes paid by the estate, and State death taxes paid by the heir or beneficiary would be consolidated into a single calculation based on the highest precredit Federal estate tax rate and the Federal inclusion rules.

The bill also contains a number of changes to make the fresh-start adjustment for appreciation accruing before 1977 simpler and more equitable. The bill would permit the fresh-start adjustment to be made for purposes of determining loss as well as gain. Thus, heirs and beneficiaries would no longer be required to maintain a different basis for gain and for loss purposes. However, the liberalized adjustment for values on December 31, 1976, could not be used to increase the heir's basis above the value used for estate tax purposes. In addition, to deal with proof of basis problems for certain property acquired before 1977, a formula would be provided to establish a minimum fresh-start basis. Under this approach, it would only be necessary to determine the date of death value and establish that the property was held by the decedent on December 31, 1976. Property eligible for this treatment would include nonbusiness tangible personal property and a personal residence. It is in regard to these types of property where adequate basis records may not have been maintained before 1977. The formula assumes that the post-1976 appreciation will accrue at approximately 6 percent a year. In addition, in order to make the transitional fresh-start adjustment completely fair, the basis computed under the formula will never be reduced below 50 percent of the date of death value of the eligible property.

Under the 1976 act, the fresh-start adjustment for nonmarketable securities is determined by assuming that appreciation accrues uniformly over the holding period. Generally, in the case of preferred stock, the proration of appreciation based on the holding period reaches an inequitable result, because the value may fluctuate very little, if at all, and yet a portion of the appreciation is considered to accrue after 1976. Of course, the longer the preferred stock is held after 1976, the greater the amount of appreciation which is automatically treated as accruing after 1976. The bill would resolve this problem by treating preferred stock having a stated redemption price as a marketable security with a market value on December 31, 1976, equal to its stated redemption price. Regulations authority would also be granted to extend this rule to other cases such as nonmarketable stock, notes, or other evidences of indebtedness with a relatively fixed value. For example, the rule could be extended to closely held stock subject to a fixed-price buy-sell arrangement among shareholders.

Regulations authority would also be provided to permit the various basis adjustments to be made for certain classes of similar property rather than having to compute the adjustments for each separate item of property. This provision would permit the determination of original cost on an average basis in appropriate circumstances. For example, it is contemplated that the use of an average per-share cost would be permitted in the case of stock acquired under a dividend reinvestment plan where the aggregate cost for all shares is known.

The bill would also provide a rule to deal with proof of basis problems arising from various small improvements to a personal residence. For relatively small amounts, records are not usually maintained. My bill would allow an adjustment of $200 per year during the decedent's holding period of his personal residence to cover minor improvements which are not substantiated by documentary evidence or other records. For any year when substantiated improvements are greater than $200, the actual cost of the improvements would be taken into account rather than the fixed dollar amount.

The carryover basis reporting requirements would be revised in several respects. First, it would no longer be necessary for the executor to furnish information to the Internal Revenue Service. Second, information would be required to be furnished to the beneficiaries only when the gross estate, excluding property which is not carryover basis property by definition, exceeds $175,000. Third, the standard for imposing a penalty for failure to furnish this information to a beneficiary would be changed so that it would be imposed only if the failure is due to negligent or intentional disregard of the reporting requirement.

The bill would also extend capital gains treatment to sales or exchanges of artwork and similar property inherited from its creator In addition, capital gains treatment would be extended to sales or exchanges of livestock and crops by an estate during a 1-year period following the decedent's death. This treatment would not be available for an estate which continued in the trade or business of farming. The purpose of this amendment is to mitigate against having bunched income from the liquidation of crops and livestock by the estate subject to the regular progressive income tax rates of up to 70 percent. In effect, the capital gains treatment would result in a maximum regular income tax rate of 35 percent on this income. This treatment would assure the same treatment of crops and livestock which is available under existing law for certain liquidations of other types of property that had been inventory to the decedent.

Under present law, capital gains treatment is available for certain redemptions of closely held stock to pay death taxes. The general purpose of this provision is to facilitate the payment of death taxes, debts, and administration expenses in situations where the estate is illiquid, because it largely consists of closely held corporate stock. However, the provision does not apply to redemptions of stock to pay the income taxes attributable to a redemption to pay death taxes. As a result of the carryover basis provision, the amount of income taxes incurred on a redemption to pay death taxes could be substantial and, therefore, aggravate liquidity problems which would force further sales of family businesses. My bill would alleviate this problem by extending capital gains treatment to redemptions to pay the income taxes incurred for qualified death tax redemptions.

My bill contains a number of other provisions to improve upon existing law. Under the bill, a decedent's estate would succeed to the decedent's unused capital loss carryovers. This treatment is consistent with the theory of carryover basis and would be justified on equitable grounds since unrealized gains would carryover to the estate or heirs. The bill also limits the amount of depreciation recaptured as ordinary income upon satisfaction of a pecuniary bequest to the gain recognized by the executor which is generally the amount of any post-death appreciation. Any remaining amount to be recaptured would be treated as ordinary income when the beneficiary disposed of the property. The bill also permits an estate to sell property on the installment method and distribute the installment obligations without triggering the recognition of income at that time. The beneficiaries would report the income as the installments are collected. In effect, this provision would extend the same tax treatment to sales followed by a distribution of the installment obligation as would occur if the property had been distributed and then sold on the installment basis by the distributees. Permitting the estate to make the sale without a difference in tax consequences resulting from the form rather than the substance of the transaction should facilitiate the administration of estates. The bill also contains a provision to facilitate changing a stock redemption plan funded by life insurance to a cross purchase plan among shareholders. This relief is provided, because the carryover basis rule resulted in different tax consequences depending upon which type of plan had been chosen in the past. Under prior law, there would have been no significant difference in tax treatment. Accordingly for plans in existence on December 31, 1976, a stock redemption plan can be changed to a cross purchase plan without adverse tax consequences if it is done before 1981.

Finally, the bill provides that eligibility for estate tax special valuation for farm and closely held business real property will not be lost because of the material participation requirements if the decedent or the surviving spouse had materially participated in the operations of the farm or business for 15 years. Thus, retirement after a substantial working career will not result in disqualification for the special estate tax benefits. In addition, recapture of the estate tax savings would not result from the operation of the farm or business by an agent if the qualified heir is a minor, a student, a handicapped person, or a surviving spouse who had attained age 62.

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. WHALEN) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. WHALEN. Mr. Speaker, earlier this month, speaking before the New Orleans Chamber of Commerce, Secretary of State Cyrus Vance described succinctly the Panama Canal treaties soon to be debated in the Senate.

Secretary Vance also explored a number of concerns which have been expressed relating to the treaties including possible construction of a sea level canal, preservation of the natural environment of Panama, protection of U.S. military and commercial interests, the cost of the treaties, and future operation of the canal by Panamanians.

I share Cyrus Vance's conclusion that these treaties look to the future. Our economic and military interests will be more secure under the new agreements than under the old. And our relations with our neighbors to the south will be enhanced and strengthened. I commend the Secretary's discussion of these issues to my colleagues:

The Panama Canal—Providing for the Future

I appreciate this opportunity to come to New Orleans tonight to talk to you about a major decision we now face as a nation.

In a few weeks, the U.S. Senate will decide whether to ratify the treaties that have been negotiated between the United States and Panama to provide for the future of the Panama Canal. It is a decision that has aroused strong feelings, although I think most Americans have reserved final judgment until they have considered all the arguments.

The debate over the treaties have been lively, at times even heated. It draws us back to a story Abraham Lincoln used to tell when discussions in his Oval Office began to boil over. Lincoln would interrupt and tell the story of a hunter who got lost in the forest when a fierce storm broke. The hard rain made it almost impossible for him to see where he was going. Night soon fell, and he had to fight the darkness as well as the rain to find his way. The thunder was deafening. Only occasional flashes of lightning showed him the trail. Finally, wet, tired, and frustrated, he fell to his knees in prayer. "If it's all the same to You, Lord," he cried, "I'd appreciate a little less noise and a lot more light."

Perhaps some of you have considered a similar prayer as you have listened to the canal debate.

This evening, I want to describe the treaties for you and then respond directly to many of the concerns that have been expressed. I hope I will shed more light than noise.

From the day we started construction over 70 years ago, the Panama Canal has always had an extra dimension for us, beyond its basic military and commercial importance. Building the canal was a remarkable feat for a young and emerging nation. Others had failed; yet we were able to cut through the mountains, cross the swamps, and control the diseases to complete a waterway that finally linked the Atlantic and the Pacific. The canal came to represent American perseverance and ingenuity, qualities that to this day continue to be among our most valuable assets as a nation.

But we all recognize, as well, that in the final analysis, the Panama Canal is not a monument. It is a navagational link that is important to this country's national interests. Our first concern must be to assure our continued ability to use the canal in the future.

It was that concern which led President Johnson in 1964, after consulting with former Presidents Truman and Eisenhower, to begin negotiations for a new treaty. Every American President since has concluded that a new treaty was necessary to secure the future availability of the canal for the ships of all nations. For that same reason, President Carter, on September 7, signed the treaties that resulted from those 14 years of negotiations.

Terms of the Treaties

Actually, two treaties have been negotiated. The first provides for the operation and defense of the canal until the end of this century. The second treaty provides for the permanent neutrality of the canal and has no termination date.

Under the terms of the first treaty, the United States will continue to operate the canal until the year 2000. A U.S. Government agency, to be called the Panama Canal Commission, will run the canal and will decide, in accordance with U.S. law, such matters as tolls and employment practices. A majority of its governing board must be American citizens. Panama will assume jurisdiction over the area of the present Canal Zone—the five-mile strip on either side of the canal—and the Canal Zone as such will cease to exist. However, until the end of this century, American bases and troops will remain in Panama, and the United States will have primary responsibility for defending the canal.

After the year 2000, Panama will be responsible for operating the canal. Well over 70 percent of the canal work force already is Panamanian. Over the next two decades, we will be training Panamanians in all aspects of operating and managing the canal.

The treaty provides extensive protections and privileges for the Americans who will be working in Panama in connection with the canal until the year 2000 and provides priority job placement and liberalized early retirement for Americans now working on the canal whose jobs ultimately will be filled by Panamanians.

The second treaty—the neutrality treaty—is of unlimited duration. It will remain in effect even after the year 2000. It commits each of the parties—the United States and Panama—to defend the canal and to keep it open to the ships of all nations.

Under the neutrality treaty—and I want to make this point very clear—the United States has the right to take any action we decide is necessary, including the use of troops, to meet any threat or aggression directed either against the canal or against the passage of any ship—ours or anyone else's—through the canal. That does not mean that we have the right to meddle in the internal affairs of Panama. It does mean, however, that we can defend and protect the canal, before and after the year 2000.

The neutrality treaty also provides for expeditious passage through the canal for American and Panamanian military vessels. In case of need or emergency, our military ships can pass through the canal more quickly than usual, and if necessary they can go to the head of the line.

Our interpretation of these rights is identical to Panama's. In October, President Carter and General Torrijos of Panama issued a statement of understanding which confirmed, in authoritative terms, these clear rights.

Sea Level Canal

There are other provisions in the treaties. One of them deals with the possibility of building a new-sea-level canal. The existing canal is too small for many of the modern supertankers and the giant new aircraft carriers. Several years ago, the United States conducted a study to determine whether it would be feasible and economical to build a new and larger canal. This study indicated that, if we were to go forward with plans for a new canal, the least expensive option by far—and the only feasible option that would not require nuclear explosives—would be to build such a canal in Panama.

Under the new treaties, we have agreed to reexamine, together with Panama, the feasibility of a new sea-level canal. The Panamanian Government has agreed that it will permit no one other than the United States to construct an interoceanic canal in Panama for the remainder of this century without our consent. We, in turn, have agreed that we will not build a new interoceanic canal anywhere in the Western Hemisphere except Panama during this same period.

NATURAL ENVIRONMENT

The treaties also commit the United States and Panama to carry out their treaty responsibilities in a manner consistent with protecting the natural environment of Panama, and they establish a joint commission to advise both governments on these essential environmental questions.

There are other provisions in the treaties, but those are their basic terms.

A number of questions and concerns have been raised about the treaties. I want to address them directly.

U.S. MILITARY POSITION

It has been asked whether these treaties adequately provide for our military needs. Do they safeguard our right to protect and defend the canal? The first place to look for an answer to these questions is to our top military advisers—the Joint Chiefs of Staff. They have the initial responsibility of our military defense. The Joint Chiefs worked closely with our negotiators every step of the way. In their judgment, these treaties fully satisfy our military interests. They afford us the rights we need to defend the canal and to assure that it remains open.

In fact, it is the view of the Joint Chiefs that these treaties not only protect our military position, they improve it. There are several reasons why:

First, in the process of negotiating the new treaties, we have separated out what is important to us—that is, continued use of the canal—from what is not important to our national interest—such as who has jurisdiction over traffic violations on the roads near the canal. We thus avoid the possibility of being drawn into disputes over matters that do not directly affect American interests.

Second, the treaties enhance our ability to defend the canal because, if that were ever necessary, we would be doing so based on agreements freely entered into by both parties and supported by the nations of Latin American and by world opinion.

Finally, our military position is enhanced because we would be defending the canal along with the Government and people of Panama. Panama's interest in defending the canal and keeping it open would be as great as our own.

PANAMANIAN ATTITUDES

The old treaty does not have the support of the Panamanian people. For them, it means their nation is divided in two. It means that a Panamanian traveling from one side of the country to the other must pass through foreign jurisdiction. It means that they cannot call all of their country their own. We do not think of our presence in Panama as colonial, but the Panamanians do.

All of these elements of an outmoded relationship would be eliminated with the new treaties. The longstanding dream of the Panamanian people for a nation undivided would be fulfilled. The people of Panama would receive a fair share of the revenue from the canal, which is, after all, their most valuable national resource.

Two-thirds of the Panamanian voters in their recent plebiscite expressed their support for these treaties. Many of those who voted against the treaties did so because they were concerned that Panama had conceded too much to the United States. Nonetheless, it is clear that these treaties have the broad approval of the Panamanian people.

If we ever have to defend the canal, we will do so. But by standing together with Panama in defense of the canal, we reduce the risk that our soldiers will ever be called upon to fight and to die defending the canal.

U.S. COMMERCIAL INTERESTS

What about our commercial interests in the canal? What effect will the new treaties have on the American economy? And what effect will they have on the Port of New Orleans? The primary consideration for businessmen who use the canal is to assure that it remains open and efficiently operated, that tolls remain reasonable, and that ships passing through the canal are safe. Companies that use the canal also want certainty about the future; they want a stable situation for the canal so that they can plan effectively. The treaties promote those interests.

PANAMANIAN OPERATION OF CANAL

As I have noted, the United States will operate the canal until the end of this century. During this period, Panamanians will gradually move into all aspects of the canal operation. Running the canal is a complex job, but the ability to perform the many tasks involved is not a question of nationality; it is a question of training. The treaty arrangements insure that Panama will be fully prepared to operate the canal effectively by the end of this period.

Keeping the canal open and running smoothly will be an economic imperative for Panama. It already derives more than 10 percent of its gross domestic product from canal-related activities. Moreover, under the new treaties, unlike the present situation, Panama's earnings from the canal will be directly related to the amount of traffic which passes through the canal. More ships will mean more money for Panama. For Panama to cut off access to any country, let alone to close the canal, would be for it to inflict a terrible wound on itself. As much as anything, that practical fact of life safeguards future access to the canal for the ships of all nations.

FUTURE TOLLS

The United States insisted during the negotiations that all payments to Panama for its contribution to the canal enterprise be drawn from the canal's revenues. To accomplish this and maintain the canal on a self-sustaining basis, some increase in the toll rate will be necessary. Our current study of the likely size of that increase is not yet completed, but it appears that it will be on the order of 30 percent. Is such an increase justified? And what will it mean for U.S. consumers and exporters?

Over the last 40 years, canal tolls have increased less than 40 cents per canal ton—from 90 cents to $1.29. These charges are far lower than tolls for the Suez Canal. The economic impact of the likely toll increase will not be substantial. For a bushel of Iowa corn being shipped to Japan from New Orleans, a 40 percent increase in canal tolls would increase current transportation costs, which are approximately 66 cents, by less than one-half cent per bushel. In terms of the overall purchase price, such a toll increase would represent a small fraction of 1 percent.

Based upon analysis that we have undertaken, a toll increase on this order would produce no significant impact upon the volume of trade to and from the Port of New Orleans. Tolls only make up a small part of the total cost of shipping a product or commodity.

But this port and this city and this entire region could be adversely affected if we don't act now to assure a secure future for the canal. Most of this country's grain exports are shipped from Gulf Coast ports. Virtually all of the grain exported to the Far East passes through the canal. Thousands of jobs rely on that trade. That trade—and those jobs—will be far more secure under the new treaties than the old.

The treaties mean far greater assurance that the canal will always remain open, that our use of it will never be interrupted, that ships passing through the canal will be safe, and that it will continue to operate as an important world trade route. I think that is important to each of us.

COST OF TREATIES

What about the cost of these treaties? It has been said that we are "paying Panama to take it." That simply is not true. Under the new treaties, Panama will be receiving greater earnings from the canal. But the payments to Panama for its contribution to the canal enterprise will be drawn from the canal's revenues. The treaties require no payments of tax dollars from the U.S. Treasury to Panama, either now or in the future. (Emphasis added.)

Separate from the treaties, we have agreed to seek certain loans, guarantees, and credits to assist Panama's development. All of these loans must be repaid. They are not grants. They will be used largely to finance U.S. trade and U.S. investments in Panama.

Some people have asked what happens if a Communist government takes over in Panama? What would happen to the canal? The fact is there is little Communist influence in Panama. Continued disagreement with Panama over the canal will only have the effect of increasing that influence. Panama has a free-enterprise economy. Its closest friends are the democratic Governments of Venezuela, Colombia, Costa Rica, and Mexico. Its ties to the United States are strong. And most important, as the canal becomes something that the Panamanian people value as much as we do now, the advantages of exploiting it for political purposes will be substantially diminished.

Finally, it is asked whether these treaties represent an American withdrawal from the world. Are they a sign of U.S. retreat?

TREATIES LOOK TO FUTURE

Just the opposite is true. These treaties are entered into by an America that is looking to the future. They are entered into by an America that is confident of its strength and prepared to act as a responsible world power.

The treaties look to the future of American trade. They promote the long-term interests of the United States as well as other maritime nations that benefit from an open and secure canal.

The treaties reflect America's future military requirements. They modernize and protect our right to defend the canal, and they enhance our ability to defend it if that is ever necessary.

The treaties look to the future of our relations with our neighbors in this hemisphere. The other nations of Latin America share Panama's opposition to the old treaty. They share Panama's support for the new treaties.

I believe most Americans want to establish a more mature partnership with Latin America, one that is based on mutual respect and admiration. Strong common interests bind the people and nations of Latin America and the United States. Our economies need that relationship. Latin America is a major market for U.S. exports and an important supplier of valuable natural resources.

By eliminating a major source of irritation that has existed between us, the new treaties enable us to strengthen our relationships throughout Latin America and reassert the most powerful source of our influence—our reputation for fairness and justice.

Finally, the treaties look to the future of our relations with the rest of the world.

They say to all the world that we will define our national interests carefully, and we will protect those interests.

They say to the world that disputes, even between large countries and small ones, can be resolved peacefully.

And they say that we will act in the world in a way that is true to our values as a nation.

The same resourcefulness and ingenuity that enabled us to build the Panama Canal now leads us to build a new arrangement for the canal that reflects present-day realities and provides for the future.

We are a nation that has been able to change with changing times. We have never rested on our laurels. We have always seized the opportunity to make things better.

The treaties serve America's interests. It is vitally important that they be approved by the U.S. Senate. Every American has a stake in the future they secure.

AMERICAN DREAM ACT INTRODUCED

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANNUNZIO) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation which will bring the American dream a little closer to millions of young couples and senior citizens. These are people who cannot afford to own their own homes or who may need additional income in order to stay in homes they already own.

The American dream has always been to own your own home and to have enough income to retire on in comfort. That is why I am calling this bill the American Dream Act. It will make that dream a more certain reality.

This double-barreled legislation will allow federally chartered savings and loan institutions to offer two types of alternative mortgages. The first, designed to help young couples and newlyweds, would be a form of graduated payment mortgage, or GPM. Monthly payments would begin at a reduced level and increase gradually over the life of the mortgage. Both the rate of increase and the interest rate would remain fixed for the duration of the loan.

Currently, many young people are forced to rent or to postpone buying a home—even though they may have a steady but small income. Their income, however, can be expected to rise and as it does, so does their ability to handle a larger mortgage payment. Under GPM, homeownership would now be possible for couples in the early years of marriage. And studies show that the impact would be tremendous. The graduated mortgage payment would allow 11 percent of current renters under the age of 35 and up to 2½ million couples to own their own homes.

The second kind of mortgage, called a reverse annuity mortgage or RAM, would permit senior citizens—many living on fixed incomes—to draw equity from their homes without having to sell. The homeowner would not only retain ownership but also receive a monthly cash payment based on the equity of his house. When the homeowner dies or decides to sell, the amount of these payments is merely deducted from the proceeds of the sale and returned to the lender.

Mr. Speaker, what happens today when these senior citizens leave the work force to live on social security or some other pension plan? In many cases inflation devours their pension income, yet that same inflation that increased the value of their homes cannot be used to make ends meet. Why should they have to wait until death to reap the economic fruits of 30 years of mortgage payments?

Under a RAM, senior citizens can live in their own homes for the rest of their lives—homes they bought and paid for. The potential is enormous. It is estimated that senior citizens currently have a net equity of $90 billion in their homes. And by the year 2000 one in four Americans will be 65 or older. The American Dream Act will help lay a foundation to deal with the problems senior citizens face and to offer a new source of income at a time when it is most needed.

I am firmly committed to the concepts of this bill. Since the American Dream Act merely grants permissive rather than mandatory authority to make the loans, I am optimistic that we can deal with it speedily, without protracted hearings. I would even attach this bill to another legislative vehicle if that could insure immediate relief for the millions of Americans who find their dreams slippery and elusive.

Mr. Speaker, the quicker we can get these mortgages on the books, the quicker we can help the people. I urge support for this bill and will do all I can to see it passed swiftly.

A bill to authorize the Federal Home Loan Bank Board to allow Federal savings and loan associations to issue graduated payment and reverse annuity mortgage instruments

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as "The American Dream Act".

SEC. 2. Section 5(c) of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933 (12 U.S.C. 1464) is amended by inserting immediately after the first undesignated paragraph thereof the following new paragraph:

"Subject to the prohibitions, limitations, and conditions as the Board may prescribe by regulation, and association may make and invest in graduated payment mortgages and reverse annuity mortgages in all States where such associations are authorized to do business. The Board shall take into account appropriate consumer safeguards in adopting any regulations which allow associations to make and invest in graduated payment mortgages and reverse annuity mortgages.".

THE HUBERT H. HUMPHREY INSTITUTE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS MEMORIAL ACT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. FORD) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to offer on behalf of myself and the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. QUIE) a bill to authorize funds for the Hubert H. Humphrey Institute of Public Affairs.

This institute, on the campus of the University of Minnesota at Minneapolis, has been founded "to perpetuate the innovative, creative and humane approach to public service exemplified by the career of Senator Hubert H. Humphrey—a center for the education, stimulation and recruitment of bright young men and women for positions in public and community service."

Those are the words, Mr. Speaker, taken from the statement of principles of the founders of this institute.

At the institute, students and scholars will study the papers of the man whose legacy to this Nation includes the Civil Rights Act, the Peace Corps, the Job Corps, Fund for Peace, the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency and the Nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty.

Already individual citizens throughout the Nation, corporations, labor unions and cooperatives have joined together in a nonpartisan effort to finance an institute which will serve as a lasting memorial to one of America's greatest legislators and statesmen—the man we honored in this very House only a few short weeks ago in a tribute given to few Americans, and, I believe, to no U.S. Senator before him.

Indeed, the formation of this institute has stimulated widespread interest—emphasizing that Senator Humphrev was a man of truly world stature. The Prime Minister of Japan only this month notified the Institute that he was recommending to the Japanese diet the appropriation of a gift of $1 million to the institute, in memory of Senator Humphrey.

Other nations, I understand, are giving serious consideration to major gifts to the institute, in the belief that there will be created a center of great value to the international community, for Hubert Humphrey is remembered throughout the world as a man of peace, of good will, and of enlightened and humane foreign policy.

At the institute, in addition to an extensive outreach program housed in its own building on the University of Minnesota campus, there will not only be a vigorous program of research and study and training in the major fields in which Senator Humphrey spent his three decades of public service, but there will also be the Humphrey Archives, the Humphrey Library collection of public affairs documents, and a strong program of outreach into the community, the State and the Nation.

I would hope—and I am given to understand that this is under active consideration—that the institute would concentrate a major effort on the study and analysis of the legislative process—the decisionmaking which is the business of the Congress and of the State legislatures.

How fitting it would be if there could rise within this institute dedicated to the memory of this singular legislator such a program of concentration in the field in which he worked, fought and accomplished so much between 1949 and 1977.

But I am confident that the funds which this legislation would authorize—the sum of $5 million—will be put to creative, imaginative and constructive use for today's scholars and for generations of students and scholars yet to come, and that the institute will come forward with programs to commit these funds that we will all be proud of. For the institute's charter includes these important words—that it will be dedicated "to enhancing the quality of American public service and to strengthening the process of American democracy through broader participation in public policy issues by an informed citizenry at large."

That was what Hubert Humphrey was all about—and that is why I know that this bill will be supported by a broad and bipartisan cross-section of the Congress—by those who were proud to be colleagues of Senator Humphrey.

And it is important that members know that Senator Humphrey's last request, through his family, was that all memorials to him should go to the Hubert H. Humphrey Institute. So it is entirely in keeping with Senator Humphrey's wishes and desires that the Congress should respond to his intense interest in the creation of this institute in his memory.

WISCONSIN SUPPORT FOR ALASKA NATIONAL INTEREST LANDS CONSERVATION ACT

(Mr. SEIBERLING asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, as the markup of the proposed Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act continues in the Subcommittee on General Oversight and Alaska Lands, I think it is useful to get some sense of the kind of support this legislation drew during the subcommittee's 6 months of hearings all over the country. While it is difficult to boil down into one succinct statement the testimony of the great majority who supported the bill among the 2,000-plus witnesses testifying in person, some of the newspaper editorials have expressed well the general tenor of this testimony.

The Milwaukee Journal, on October 1, 1977, took editorial notice of the importance of this conservation proposal, and analyzed the merits of contending arguments. I believe all of our colleagues, and especially those from Wisconsin, will find it of considerable interest. The full text of the editorial follows:

ALASKA—OUR LAST VAST WILDERNESS

Congress is about to undertake a colossal zoning job—the carving up of Alaska for various uses. It's a task that should be approached with some reverence and a great deal of thought for future generations.

Alaska is a vast, wild, indescribably beautiful state; a place of massive mountains, glaciers, tumbling rivers, sheltered ocean inlets; fragile habitat for whales, caribou and other endangered mammals; a summer refuge for millions of waterfowl that flock annually to all parts of North America.

It is a land whose grandeur can recharge the spirit of the sensitive visitor and strike awe even in the jaded. And it is home to 400,000 Americans, including the native Indians, Eskimos and Aleuts and thousands of settlers from the Lower 48 who were lured by the wilderness and solitude.

But the 49th state is also a repository of mineral wealth and a potential frontier for industrial development. Thus, Congress will be under a great pressure to give preference to the short term interests of extractive industries and land developers rather than to the long range need to protect precious environmental and esthetic values.

When Alaska became a state, 99% of its 365 million acres belonged to the federal government. But the federal share has shrunk substantially. The government yielded 104.5 million acres to the state itself, 44 million to the native peoples and 5.5 million to the oil pipeline corridor. Much of the remaining acreage was designated "public interest" land and was open to some development.

So, the amount of land available for preservation has dwindled greatly, although Congress still will have considerable leeway when it chooses among the various, competing proposals being pushed.

The two most commendable plans are those of Interior Secretary Andrus and Rep. Udall (D-Ariz.). Andrus wants to protect 92 million acres in national parks, wildlife refuges, wild and scenic rivers and ecological preserves. The Udall proposal is similar, but would encompass 115 million acres.

Least desirable of the major proposals is one offered by Alaska's Sen. Stevens. It would protect only 48 million acres and place 57 million acres in a vague category of "cooperative lands," a classification that might invite abuse by land developers and the mining and timber interests.

Congress should not accept modest goals when the issue is preservation of what Andrus has properly called "the crown jewels of Alaska." Better to set aside too much land than to squander environmental treasures that could never be retrieved.

WHY DOES THE UNITED STATES SUPPORT TERRORIST TACTICS IN RHODESIA?

(Mr. SIKES asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Speaker, concern shown by Britain and the United States over the fact that Rhodesia's white government may be nearing accord with moderate black leaders for the establishment of a black majority government for that country appears to be approaching panic proportions.

Rhodesia's Prime Minister, Ian Smith, and three moderate black leaders are nearing agreement on a multiracial interim government. The United States has given no support to that effort. Apparently, we and the British, prefer to encourage terrorist tactics and bloody raids. The Smith government is negotiating with three black nationalist leaders who carry on their efforts within Rhodesia. They are Bishop Abel Muzorewa, the Reverend Ndabaningi Sithole, and Chief Jeremiah Chirau.

We have continued to ignore efforts for a peaceful settlement within Rhodesia. We concentrate on backing revolutionaries even though they have refused to accept the presence of a British resident commissioner in Rhodesia; they insist on superintending a revolutionary period leading to elections for a black majority government; and they resist the presence of a U.N. peace-keeping force. They want no guarantees for the white population. As an alternative to outright surrender to their demands, they promise to concentrate on an expanding civil war if Rhodesia is not handed over to them. These are the people our Government supports.

Andrew Young, U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations and British Foreign Secretary David Owen, are now meeting in Malta with radical black leaders in an effort to forestall the progress being made in Rhodesia.

The radical black leaders, Robert Mugabe and Joshua Nkomo operate from nations bordering Rhodesia. They conduct raids into Rhodesia killing and burning indiscriminately. They are Communist equipped and Communist trained. It is ironic that their terrorist tactics and their Communist backing do not dampen the enthusiasm of the United Nations, Britain, and the United States for their cause. In fact, our Mr. Young, personally escorted their leaders during conferences of the "World Conference for Action Against Apartheid," held in Nigeria last August.

It is not difficult to speculate on the outcome if efforts of Britain and the United States to set up a Rhodesian Government in exile are successful. A takeover of Rhodesia by the Communist-oriented front would simply provide a repetition of the Angola situation where the whites were killed or driven out and their property confiscated. In the case of Angola, the timid efforts by the United States in support of a more moderate faction were frustrated by Congress. Civil war conditions continue to exist in Uganda and over 20,000 Cuban troops are employed in maintaining the Marxists in power.

Many people in and out of the United States are disappointed at the inability of our country to formulate constructive foreign policies without kowtowing to the United Nations. It is not to our advantage to support Communist-dominated governments in any country. Yet, that is exactly what we are trying to do in Rhodesia. We are demanding the outright surrender of the present government and ignoring all efforts to establish a moderate government that would, at least, remain neutral toward Western policies.

TO INCREASE THE FEDERAL CROP INSURANCE PROGRAM

(Mr. SIKES asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Speaker, for many years I have advocated Federal insurance for crops in all counties. I feel that this offers one assured way of helping the farmer to overcome the hazards of weather in his crop production efforts. The farmer is, of course, subjected to the twin hazards of adverse weather and uncertain market conditions. Through an expanded crop insurance program, we can help to resolve at least one major part of this problem. I am now introducing legislation to accomplish this objective. I know that the Secretary of Agriculture favors an expansion of the crop insurance program. I hope that this bill and similar bills will have his support and that of the administration. It should receive early attention.

As a part of the new expanded crop insurance program, this bill would establish a new entity in the Department of Agriculture—the Farm Production Protection Corporation. The FPPC would be granted broad authority to provide protection against loss of investment due to natural hazards on any agricultural crop or livestock commodity in all geographic areas where such production is suitable. A new concept included in this proposed legislation is a Disaster Relief Fund from which indemities could be paid if production losses are above normal in any country and a catastrophic or disaster loss is declared by the Board.

The initial objectives of the Farm Production Protection Act will be to provide economic stability to producers of wheat, cotton, corn, barley, grain sorghum, and rice on a national basis. Also, it will expand this protection to producers of other major farm products as soon as the Secretary of Agriculture and the Board of Directors of the FPPC feel is prudent and are able to develop an appropriate actuarial structure. This will provide a strong program to prevent loss of the producers farm production costs in the face of unavoidable natural causes.

The primary purpose of the legislation is to assure a supply of food and fiber sufficient to meet the needs of domestic consumption and export demand and to permit a high export level for our agricultural products. Also, it will assure a strong and substantial rural agricultural and commercial financial structure. This economic protection will virtually assure the consumer of agriculture products in the marketplace and a long range continuation of a plentiful supply of food and fiber. This would be a major forward step in minimizing a conflict between the agricultural producer and the consumer.

Financing under this legislation during ordinary or nondisaster conditions will be by subscription of $300 million capital stock, premiums paid by participating farmers, and appropriated funds for operating expenses. Experienced gained from the existing crop insurance program has fully demonstrated the feasibility of the financing concept since premiums paid by farmers from 1948 through 1976 have been equal to indemnities incurred for losses.

In the event of catastrophic and disaster-type loss situations, the Secretary of Agriculture is empowered to expand whatever funds are necessary to meet the needs of the immediate situation in a timely manner. These expenditures will not be permitted to increase the premium costs or reduce the protection guarantees to participating farmers. This will prevent making the program cost prohibitive to participants and assure a continuation of the economic stability and protection needed in disaster areas.

TITLE I—FINDINGS AND PURPOSES WITH RESPECT TO MANAGING THE RESOURCES OF THE OUTER CONTINENTAL SHELF

FINDINGS

SEC. 101. The Congress finds and declares that—

(1) the demand for energy in the United States is increasing and will continue to increase for the foreseeable future;

(2) domestic production of oil and gas has declined in recent years;

(3) the United States has become increasingly dependent upon imports of oil from foreign nations to meet domestic energy demand;

(4) increasing reliance on imported oil is not inevitable, but is rather subject to significant reduction by increasing the development of domestic sources of energy supply;

(5) consumption of natural gas in the United States has greatly exceeded additions to domestic reserves in recent years;

(6) technology is or can be made available which will allow significantly increased domestic production of oil and gas without undue harm or damage to the environment;

(7) the lands and resources of the Outer Continental Shelf are public property which the Government of the United States holds in trust for the people of the United States;

(8) the Outer Continental Shelf contains significant quantities of oil and natural gas and is a vital national resource reserve which must be carefully managed so as to realize fair value, to preserve and maintain competition, and to reflect the public interest;

(9) there presently exists a variety of technological, economic, environmental, administrative, and legal problems which tend to retard the development of the oil and natural gas reserves of the Outer Continental Shelf;

(10) environmental and safety regulations relating to activities on the Outer Continental Shelf should be reviewed in light of current technology and information;

(11) the development, processing, and distribution of the oil and gas resources of the Outer Continental Shelf, and the siting of related energy facilities, may cause adverse impacts on various States and local governments;

(12) policies, plans, and programs developed by States and local governments in response to activities on the Outer Continental Shelf cannot anticipate and ameliorate such adverse impacts unless such States and local governments are provided with timely access to information regarding activities on the Outer Continental Shelf and an opportunity to review and comment on decisions relating to such activities;

(13) funds must be made available to pay for the prompt removal of any oil spilled or discharged as a result of activities on the Outer Continental Shelf and for any damages to public or private interests caused by such spills or discharges; and

(14) because of the possible conflicts between exploitation of the oil and gas resources in the Outer Continental Shelf and other uses of the marine environment, including fish and shellfish growth and recovery, and recreational activity, the Federal Government must assume responsibility for the minimization or elimination of any conflict associated with such exploitation.

PURPOSES

SEC. 102. The purposes of this Act are to—

(1) establish policies and procedures for managing the oil and natural gas resources of the Outer Continental Shelf in order to achieve national economic and energy policy goals, assure national security, reduce dependence on foreign sources, and maintain a favorable balance of payments in world trade;

(2) preserve, protect, and develop oil and natural gas resources in the Outer Continental Shelf in a manner which is consistent with the need (A) to make such resources available to meet the Nation's energy needs as rapidly as possible, (B) to balance orderly energy resource development with protection of the human, marine, and coastal environments, (C) to insure the public a fair and equitable return on the resources of the Outer Continental Shelf, and (D) to preserve and maintain free enterprise competition;

(3) encourage development of new and improved technology for energy resource production which will eliminate or minimize risk of damage to the human, marine, and coastal environments;

(4) provide States, and through States, local governments, which are impacted by Outer Continental Shelf oil and gas exploration, development, and production with comprehensive assistance in order to anticipate and plan for such impact, and thereby to assure adequate protection of the human environment;

(5) assure that States, and through States, local governments, have timely access to information regarding activities on the Outer Continental Shelf, and opportunity to review and comment on decisions relating to such activities, in order to anticipate, ameliorate, and plan for the impacts of such activities;

(6) assure that States, and through States, local governments, which are directly affected by exploration, development, and production of oil and natural gas are provided an opportunity to participate in policy and planning decisions relating to management of the resources of the Outer Continental Shelf;

(7) minimize or eliminate conflicts between the exploration, development, and production of oil and natural gas, and the recovery of other resources such as fish and shellfish;

(8) establish an oilspill liability fund to pay for the prompt removal of any oil spilled or discharged as a result of activities on the Outer Continental Shelf and for any damages to public or private interests caused by such spills or discharges; and

(9) insure that the extent of oil and natural gas resources of the Outer Continental Shelf is assessed at the earliest practicable time.

ADMINISTRATION OF LEASING OF THE OUTER CONTINENTAL SHELF.—(a) The Secretary shall administer the provisions of this Act relating to the leasing in the outer Continental Shelf and shall prescribe or retain such regulations as necessary to carry out such provisions. The Secretary may at any time prescribe and amend such rules and regulations as he determines to be necessary and proper in order to provide for the prevention of waste and conservation of the natural resources of the outer Continental Shelf, and the protection of correlative rights therein. Except as provided in this subsection, such regulations shall, as of the date of their promulgation, apply to all operations conducted under any lease issued or maintained under the provisions of this Act and shall be in furtherance of the policies of this Act. No regulation promulgated under this Act affecting operations commenced on an existing lease before the effective date of such regulation shall impose any additional requirements which would result in delays in the exploration, development, or production of resources unless the Secretary publishes a finding that such regulation is necessary to prevent serious or irreparable harm or damage to health, life, property any mineral deposits or geothermal steam resources, or to the marine, coastal, or human environment.

In the enforcement of safety, environmental, and conservation laws and regulations, the Secretary shall cooperate with the relevant departments and agencies of the Federal Government and of the affected States. In the formulation and promulgation of regulations, the Secretary shall request and give due consideration to the views of the Attorney General and the Federal Trade Commission with respect to matters which may affect competition. The regulations prescribed by the Secretary under this subsection shall include, but not be limited to, provisions—

"(1) for the suspension or temporary prohibition of any operation or activity, including production, pursuant to any lease or permit (A) at the request of a lessee to facilitate proper development of a lease in the national interest, or to allow for the unavailability of transportation facilities, or (B) if there is a threat of serious, irreparable, or immediate harm or damage to life (including fish and other aquatic life), to property, to any mineral deposits or geothermal steam resources (in areas leased or not leased), or to the marine, coastal, or human environment, and for the extension of any permit or lease affected by such suspension or prohibition by a period equivalent to the period of such suspension or prohibition, except that no permit or lease shall be so extended when such suspension or prohibition is the result of gross negligence or willful violation of such lease or permit, or of regulations issued concerning such lease or permit;

"(2) with respect to cancellation of any lease or permit—

"(A) that such cancellation may occur at any time, if the Secretary determines, after a hearing, that—

"(i) continued activity pursuant to such lease or permit would probably cause serious harm or damage to life (including fish and other aquatic life), to property, to any mineral deposits or geothermal steam resources (in areas leased or not leased), to the national security or defense, or to the marine, coastal, or human environments;

"(ii) the threat of harm or damage will not disappear or decrease to an acceptable extent within a reasonable period of time; and

"(iii) the advantages of cancellation outweigh the advantages of continuing such lease or permit in force;

"(B) that such cancellation shall—

"(i) not occur unless and until operations under such lease or permit have been under suspension or temporary prohibition by the Secretary (with due extension of any lease or permit term) for a total period of five years or for a lesser period, in the Secretary's discretion, upon request of the lessee or permittee;

"(ii) in the case of a lease issued after the date of the enactment of this paragraph (other than a lease cancelled for reasons of national security or defense at the request of the Secretary of Defense), entitle the lessee to receive such compensation as he shows to the Secretary as being equal to the lesser of (I) the fair value of the cancelled rights as of the date of cancellation, taking account of both anticipated revenues from the lease and anticipated costs, including costs of compliance with all applicable regulations and operating orders, liability for cleanup costs or damages, or both, in the case of an oil spill, and all other costs reasonably anticipated on such lease, or (II) the excess, if any, over the lessee's revenues from the lease (plus interest thereon from the date of receipt to the date of reimbursement) of all consideration paid for the lease and all direct expenditures made by the lessee after the date of issuance of such lease and in connection with exploration or development, or both, pursuant to the lease (plus interest on such consideration and such expenditures from the date of payment to the date of reimbursement); and

"(iii) in the case of a lease issued before the date of the enactment of this paragraph, or a lease cancelled for reasons of national security or defense (whenever issued), entitle the lessee to receive fair value in accordance with subclause (I) of clause (ii) of this subparagraph;

"(3) for the assignment or relinquishment of a lease;

"(4) for unitization, pooling, and drilling agreements;

"(5) for the subsurface storage of oil and gas other than by the Federal Government;

"(6) for drilling or easements necessary for exploration, development, and production;

"(7) for the prompt and efficient exploration and development of a lease area;

"(8) for compliance with any standards established by a State pursuant to the Clean Air Act to the extent that activities authorized under this Act affect the air quality of such State;

"(9) for the establishment of air quality standards for operations on the outer Continental Shelf under this Act.

"(b) The issuance and continuance in effect of any lease, or of any extension, renewal, or replacement of any lease, under the provisions of this Act shall be conditioned upon compliance with the regulations issued under this Act if the lease is issued under the provisions of section 8 hereof, or with the regulations issued under the provisions of section 6(b), clause (2), hereof, if the lease is maintained under the provisions of section 6 hereof.

"(c) Whenever the owner of a nonproducing lease fails to comply with any of the provisions of this Act, or of the lease, or of the regulations issued under this Act if the lease is issued under the provisions of section 8 hereof, or of the regulations issued under the provisions of section 6(b), clause (2), hereof, if the lease is maintained under the provisions of section 6 hereof, such lease may be canceled by the Secretary, subject to the right of judicial review as provided in this Act, if such default continues for the period of thirty days after mailing of notice by registered letter to the lease owner at his record post office address.

"(d) Whenever the owner of any producing lease fails to comply with any of the provisions of this Act, or of the lease, or of the regulations issued under this Act if the lease is issued under the provisions of section 8 hereof, or of the regulations issued under the provisions of section 6(b), clause (2), hereof, if the lease is maintained under the provisions of section 6 hereof, such lease may be forfeited and canceled by an appropriate proceeding in any United States district court having jurisdiction under the provisions of this Act.

"(e) Rights-of-way through the submerged lands of the outer Continental Shelf, whether or not such lands are included in a lease maintained or issued pursuant to this Act, may be granted by the Secretary for pipeline purposes for the transportation of oil, natural gas, sulfur, or other mineral, or geothermal steam, under such regulations and upon such conditions as may be prescribed by the Secretary, or where appropriate the Secretary of Transportation, including (as provided in section 21(b) of this Act) utilization of the best available and safest technology for pipeline burial and other procedures, and upon the express condition that such oil or gas pipelines shall transport or purchase without discrimination, oil or natural gas produced from such lands in the vicinity of the pipeline in such proportionate amounts as the Federal Power Commission, in the case of gas, and the Interstate Commerce Commission, in consultation with the Administrator of the Federal Energy Administration, in the case of oil, may, after a full hearing with due notice thereof to the interested parties, determine to be reasonable, taking into account, among other things, conservation and the prevention of waste. Failure to comply with the provisions of this section or the regulations and conditions prescribed under this section shall be ground for forfeiture of the grant in an appropriate judicial proceeding instituted by the United States in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction under the provisions of this Act.

"(f)(1) The lessee shall produce any oil or gas, or both, obtained pursuant to an approved development and production plan, at rates consistent with any rule or order issued by the President in accordance with any provision of law.

"(2) If no rule or order referred to in paragraph (1) has been issued, the lessee shall produce such oil or gas, or both, at rates consistent with any regulation promulgated by the Secretary which is to assure the maximum rate of production which may be sustained without loss of ultimate recovery of oil or gas, or both, under sound engineering and economic principles, and which is safe for the duration of the activity covered by the approved plan. The Secretary may permit the lessee to vary such rates if he finds that such variance is necessary.

"(g)(1) In administering the provisions of this Act, the Secretary shall coordinate the activities of any Federal department or agency having authority to issue any license, lease, or permit to engage in any activity related to the exploration, development, or production of oil or gas from the outer Continental Shelf for purposes of assuring that, to the maximum extent practicable, inconsistent or duplicative requirements are not imposed upon any applicant for, or holder of, any such license, lease, or permit.

"(2) The head of any Federal department or agency who takes any action which has a direct and significant effect on the outer Continental Shelf or its development shall promptly notify the Secretary of such action and the Secretary shall thereafter notify and consult with the Governor of any affected State and the Secretary may thereafter recommend such change or changes in such action as are considered appropriate.

"(h) After the date of enactment of this section, no holder of any oil and gas lease issued or maintained pursuant to this Act shall be permitted to flare natural gas from any well unless the Secretary finds that there is no practicable way to complete production of such gas, or that such flaring is necessary to alleviate a temporary emergency situation or to conduct testing or work-over operations.".

REVISION OF BIDDING AND LEASE ADMINISTRATION

SEC. 205. (a) Subsections (a) and (b) of section 8 of the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act (43 U.S.C. 1337 (a) and (b)) are amended to read as follows:

"(a)(1) The Secretary is authorized to grant to the highest responsible qualified bidder or bidders by competitive bidding, under regulations promulgated in advance, an oil and gas lease on submerged lands of the outer Continental Shelf which are not covered by leases meeting the requirements of subsection (a) of section 6 of this Act. The bidding shall be by sealed bid and, at the discretion of the Secretary, on the basis of—

"(A) cash bonus bid with a royalty at not less than 12½ per centum fixed by the Secretary in amount or value of the production saved, removed, or sold;

"(B) variable royalty bid based on a per centum of the production saved, removed, or sold, with a cash bonus as determined by the Secretary;

"(C) cash bonus bid with diminishing or sliding royalty based on such formulae as the Secretary shall determine as equitable to encourage continued production from the lease area as resources diminish, but not less than 12½ per centum as the beginning of the lease period in amount or value of the production saved, removed, or sold;

"(D) cash bonus bid with a fixed share of the net profits of not less than 30 per centum to be derived from the production of oil and gas from the lease area;

"(E) fixed cash bonus with the net profit share reserved as the bid variable;

"(F) cash bonus bid with a royalty at not less than 12½ per centum fixed by the Secretary in amount or value of the production saved, removed, or sold and a per centum share of net profits of not less than 30 per centum to be derived from the production of oil and gas from the lease area;

"(G) fixed cash bonus of not less than sixty-two dollars per hectare with a work commitment stated in a dollar amount as the bid variable;

"(H) a fixed royalty at not less than 12½ per centum in amount or value of the production saved, removed, or sold, or a fixed per centum share of new profits of not less than 30 per centum to be derived from the production of oil and gas from the lease area, with a work commitment stated in a dollar amount as the bid variable;

"(I) a fixed cash bonus of not less than sixty-two dollars per hectare, with a fixed royalty of not less than 12½ per centum in amount or value of the production saved, removed or sold, or a fixed per centum share of net profits of not less than 30 per centum to be derived from the production of oil and gas from the lease area with a work commitment stated in dollar amounts as the bid variable; or

"(J) any modification of bidding systems authorized in subparagraphs (A) through (I) of this paragraph.

"(2) The Secretary may, in his discretion, defer any part of the payment of the cash bonus, as authorized in paragraph (1) of this subsection, according to a schedule announced at the time of the announcement of the lease sale, but such payment shall be made in total no later than five years from the date of the lease sale.

"(3) The Secretary may, in order to promote increased production on the lease area, through direct, secondary, or tertiary recovery means, reduce or eliminate any royalty or net profit share set forth in the lease for such area.

"(4)(A) Before utilizing any bidding system authorized in subparagraphs (C) through (J) of paragraph (1), the Secretary shall establish such system in accordance with this paragraph.

"(B) The establishment by the Secretary of any bidding system pursuant to subparagraph (A) of this paragraph shall be by rule after an opportunity for a hearing, in accordance with section 501 of the Department of Energy Organization Act (42 U.S.C. 7191). Any modification of any such bidding system shall be by rule in accordance with such section 501.

"(C) Not later than thirty days before the effective date of any rule prescribed under subparagraph (B) of this paragraph, the Secretary shall transmit such rule to Congress.

"(5)(A) The Secretary shall utilize the bidding alternatives from among those authorized by this subsection, in accordance with subparagraphs (B) and (C) of this paragraph, so as to accomplish the purposes and policies of this Act, including (i) providing a fair and timely return to the Federal Government, (ii) increasing competition, (iii) assuring competent and safe operations, (iv) avoiding undue speculation, (v) avoiding unnecessary delays in exploration, development, and production, (vi) discovering and recovering oil and gas, (vii) developing new oil and gas resources in an efficient and timely manner, and (viii) limiting administrative burdens on government and industry. In order to select a bid to accomplish these purposes and policies, the Secretary may, in his discretion, require each bidder to submit bids for any area of the Outer Continental Shelf in accordance with more than one of the bidding alternatives set forth in paragraph (1) of this subsection.

"(B) During the five-year period commencing on the date of enactment of this subsection, the Secretary may, in order to obtain statistical information to determine which bidding alternatives will best accomplish the purposes and policies of this Act, require each bidder to submit bids for any area of the outer Continental Shelf in accordance with more than one of the bidding systems set forth in paragraph (1) of this subsection. For such statistical purposes, leases may be awarded using a bidding alternative selected at random or determined by the Secretary to be desirable for the acquisition of valid statistical data and otherwise consistent with the provisions of this Act.

"(C) (1) The bidding systems authorized by subparagraphs (3) through (J) of paragraph (1) of this subsection shall not be applied to more than 50 per centum of the total area offered for lease each year, during the five-year period beginning on the date of enactment of this subsection, in each region in a frontier area.

"(D) Within six months after the end of each fiscal year, the Secretary shall report to the Congress, as provided in section 15 of this Act, with respect to the use of the various bidding options provided for in this subsection. Such report shall include—

"(i) the schedule of all lease sales held during such year and the bidding system or systems utilized;

"(ii) the schedule of all lease sales to be held the following year and the bidding systems or systems to be utilized;

"(iii) the benefits and costs associated with conducting lease sales using the various bidding systems;

"(iv) if applicable, the reasons why a particular bidding system has not been or will not be utilized;

"(v) if applicable, the reasons why more than 50 per centum of the area leased in the past year, or to be offered for lease in the upcoming year, was or is to be leased under the bidding system authorized by subparagraph (A) of paragraph (1) of this subsection; and

"(vi) an analysis of the capability of each bidding system to accomplish the purposes and policies stated in subparagraph (A) of this paragraph.

"(vii) any recommendations, accompanied by detailed justifications, for additional legislation which would further revise the bidding systems used under this Act.

"(6)(A) In any lease sale where the bidding system authorized by subparagraph (A) of paragraph (1) of this subsection and any one or more of the bidding systems authorized by subparagraphs (B) through (J) of paragraph (1) of this subsection are to be used, the Secretary shall publicly choose, by a random selection method, those tracts which are to be offered under the bidding system authorized by such subparagraph (A) and those which are to be offered under one or more of the bidding systems authorized by such subparagraphs (B) through (J).

"(B) The selection of tracts under this paragraph shall occur after the Secretary has determined the tracts to be included in such proposed lease sale.

"(C) Before selection of tracts for inclusion in the proposed lease sale, the Secretary shall publish a notice in the Federal Register describing the random selection method to be used and shall, immediately after such selection, publish a notice in the Federal Register designating the lease tracts selected which are to be offered under the bidding system authorized by subparagraph (A) of paragraph (1) and the lease tracts selected which are to be offered under any one or more of the bidding systems authorized by subparagraphs (B) through (J) of paragraph (1).

"(b) Subsection (c) of section 105 of the Energy Policy and Conservation Act of 1975 (42 U.S.C. 6213) is amended to read as follows:

"(c) If the Secretary determines that exploration and development will occur only if the exemption is granted, he may exempt bidding for leases for lands located in frontier or other areas determined by the Secretary to be extremely high risk lands or to present unusually high cost exploration, or development problems.".

"(c) An oil and gas lease issued pursuant to this section shall—

"(1) be for a tract consisting of a compact area not exceeding five thousand seven hundred and sixty acres, as the Secretary may determine, unless the Secretary finds that a larger area is necessary to comprise a reasonable economic production unit;

"(2) be for an initial period of—

"(A) five years; or

"(B) not to exceed ten years where the Secretary finds that such longer period is necessary to encourage exploration and development in areas of unusually deep water or unusually adverse weather conditions, and as long after such initial period as oil or gas may be produced from the area in paying quantities, or drilling or well reworking operations as approved by the Secretary are conducted thereon;

"(3) require the payment of amount or value as determined by one of the bidding systems set forth in subsection (a) of this section;

"(4) entitle the lessee to explore, develop, and produce oil and gas resources contained within the lease area, conditioned upon due diligent requirements and the approval of the development and production plan required by this Act;

"(5) provide for suspension or cancellation of the lease during the initial lease term or thereafter pursuant to section 5 of this Act;

"(6) contain such rental and other provisions as the Secretary may prescribe at the time of offering the area for lease; and

"(7) provide a requirement that the lessee offer 20 per centum of its interest in the crude oil, condensate, and natural gas liquids produced from such lease, at the market value and point of delivery applicable to Federal royalty oil, to small or independent refiners as defined in the Emergency Petroleum Allocation Act of 1973.".

(b) Section 8 of the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act (43 U.S.C. 1337) is further amended by striking out subsection (j), by relettering subsections (c) through (i), and all references thereto, as subsections (h) through (n), respectively, and by inserting immediately after subsection (b) the following new subsections:

"(c) No lease may be issued if the Secretary finds after notice and hearing that an applicant for a lease, or a lessee, is not meeting due diligence requirements on other leases. In his notice of each lease sale the Secretary shall identify each lessee who has been notified by the Secretary that he, at the time of such notice, is not meeting due diligence requirements on one or more of his oil and gas leases. All other lessees not identified in such notice shall be conclusively presumed to be meeting due diligence requirements for the purposes of this subsection.

"(d) No lease issued under this Act may be sold, exchanged, assigned, or otherwise transferred except with the approval of the Secretary. Prior to any such approval, the Secretary shall consult with and give due consideration to the views of the Attorney General and the Federal Trade Commission.

"(e) Nothing in this Act shall be deemed to convey to any person, association, corporation, or other business organization, immunity from civil or criminal liability, or to create defenses to actions, under any antitrust law.

"(f)(1) At the time of soliciting nominations for the leasing of lands within three miles of the seaward boundary of any coastal State, the Secretary shall provide the Governor of any such State—

"(A) an identification and schedule of the areas and regions offered for leasing;

"(B) all information concerning the geographical, geological, and ecological characteristics of such regions;

"(C) an estimate of the oil and gas reserves in the areas proposed for leasing; and

"(D) an identification of any field, geological structure, or trap located within three miles of the seaward boundary of a coastal State.

"(2) After receipt of nominations for any area of the outer Continental Shelf within three miles of the seaward boundary of any coastal State, the Secretary shall inform the Governor of such coastal State of any such area which the Secretary believes should be given further consideration for leasing and which he concludes, in consultation with the Governor of such coastal State, may contain one or more oil or gas pools or fields underlying both the outer Continental Shelf and lands subject to the jurisdiction of such State. If, with respect to such area, the Secretary selects a tract or tracts which may contain one or more oil or gas pools or fields underlying both the outer Continental Shelf and submerged lands subject to the jurisdiction of such State, the Secretary shall offer the Governor of such coastal State the opportunity to enter into an agreement concerning the disposition of revenues which may be generated by a Federal lease within such area in order to permit their fair and equitable division between the State and Federal Government.

"(3) Within ninety days after the offer by the Secretary pursuant to paragraph (2) of this subsection, the Governor shall elect whether to enter into such agreement and shall notify the Secretary of his decision. If the Governor accepts the offer, the terms of any lease issued shall be consistent with the provisions of this Act, with applicable regulations, and, to the maximum extent practicable, with the applicable laws of the coastal State. If the Governor declines the offer, or if the parties cannot agree to terms concerning the disposition of revenues from such lease (by the time the Secretary determines to offer the area for lease), the Secretary may nevertheless proceed with the leasing of the area.

"(4) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the Secretary shall deposit in a separate account in the Treasury of the United States all bonuses, royalties, and other revenues attributable to oil and gas pools underlying both the outer Continental Shelf and submerged lands subject to the jurisdiction of any coastal State until such time as the Secretary and the Governor of such coastal State agree on, or if the Secretary and the Governor of such coastal State cannot agree, as a district court of the United States determines the fair and equitable disposition of such revenues and any interest which has accrued and the proper rate of payments to be deposited in the treasuries of the Federal Government and such coastal State.

"(g) Nothing contained in this section shall be construed to alter, limit, or modify any claim of any State to any jurisdiction over, or any right, title, or interest in, any submerged lands.".

(c) Section 8(j) of the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act (43 U.S.C. 1337(j)), as relettered by subsection (b) of this section, is amended—

(1) by inserting "and leases of geothermal steam" immediately after "sulphur"; and

(2) by inserting "or geothermal steam" immediately after "such mineral".

"(d) The Secretary shall exclude from any lease or pre-lease exploratory drilling any tract lying within fifteen miles of the boundaries of any National Wilderness Area existing as of the date of enactment of this section, except if a State conducts a leasing or development within its tidelands adjacent to such area.

OUTER CONTINENTAL SHELF OIL AND GAS EXPLORATION

SEC. 206. Section 11 of the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act (43 U.S.C. 1340) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 11. OUTER CONTINENTAL SHELF OIL AND GAS EXPLORATION.—(a) (1) The Secretary or any other agency of the United States and any person whom the Secretary by permit or regulation may authorize, may conduct geological and geophysical explorations in the Outer Continental Shelf which do not interfere with or endanger actual operations pursuant to any lease issued or maintained pursuant to this Act, and which are not unduly harmful to the marine environment.

"(2) In order to obtain more accurate and adequate information regarding the oil and gas resources of the Outer Continental Shelf, prior to the first lease sale in each frontier area the Secretary shall publish in the Federal Register a request that potential permittees apply for a permit to participate in a continental offshore stratigraphic test or other such economically feasible off-structure test drilling operations as are authorized by regulation. Should no potential permittee apply for such a permit within sixty days of the publication in the Federal Register of the Secretary's invitation to participate, the Secretary may contract for such off-structure drilling: Provided, That no funds shall be appropriated for such drilling prior to the fiscal year beginning October 1, 1978: Provided further, That budget requests for the funds necessary to implement this subsection shall be displayed as a separate line item and appropriately justified, as part of the department's annual budget request.

"(3) The provisions of paragraph (1) of this subsection shall not apply to any person conducting explorations pursuant to an approved exploration plan on any area under lease to such person pursuant to the provisions of this Act.

"(b) Except as provided in subsection (f) of this section, beginning ninety days after the date of enactment of this subsection, no exploration pursuant to any oil and gas lease issued or maintained under this Act may be undertaken by the holder of such lease, except in accordance with the provisions of this section.

"(c) (1) Except as otherwise provided in this Act, prior to commencing exploration pursuant to any oil and gas lease issued or maintained under this Act, the holder thereof shall submit an exploration plan to the Secretary for approval. Such plan may apply to more than one lease held by a lessee in any one region of the outer Continental Shelf, or by a group of lessees acting under a unitization, pooling, or drilling agreement and shall be approved by the Secretary if he finds that such plan is consistent with the provisions of this Act, regulations prescribed under this Act, and the provisions of such lease or leases. The Secretary shall require such modifications or remodifications of such plan as are necessary to achieve such consistency. The Secretary shall approve such plan, as submitted or modified, within thirty days of its submission or resubmission, except that if the Secretary determines that (A) any proposed activity under such plan would result in any condition which would permit him to suspend such activity pursuant to regulations prescribed under section 5(a)(1) of this Act, and (B) such proposed activity cannot be modified to avoid such condition, he may delay the approval of such plan.

"(2) An exploration plan submitted under this subsection shall include, in the degree of detail which the Secretary may by regulation require—

"(A) a schedule of anticipated exploration activities to be undertaken;

"(B) a description of equipment to be used for such activities;

"(C) the general location of each well to be drilled; and

"(D) such other information deemed pertinent by the Secretary.

"(3) The Secretary may, by regulation, require that such plan be accompanied by a general statement of anticipated onshore activity resulting from such exploration, the effects and impacts of such activity, and the development and production intentions, which shall be for planning purposes only and which shall not be binding on any party.

"(d) The Secretary may, by regulation, require any lessee operating under an approved exploration plan to obtain a permit prior to drilling any well in accordance with such plan.

"(e) (1) If a revision of an exploration plan approved under this subsection is submitted to the Secretary, the process to be used for the approval of such revision shall be the same as set forth in subsection (c) of this section.

"(2) Except as otherwise provided in this Act, all exploration activities pursuant to any lease shall be conducted in accordance with an approved exploration plan or an approved revision of such plan.

"(f) (1) Exploration activities pursuant to any lease on which a drilling permit had been issued prior to the date of enactment of this subsection shall be considered in compliance with this section, but the Secretary may require such activities to be described in an exploration plan, or require a revised exploration plan, and require any such plan to be accompanied by a general statement in accordance with subsection (c) (3) of this section.

"(2) In accordance with section 5(a) of this Act, the Secretary may require the submission of additional information or establish additional requirements on lessees conducting exploration activities pursuant to any lease issued prior to the date of enactment of this subsection.

NEW SECTIONS OF THE OUTER CONTINENTAL SHELF LANDS ACT

SEC. 208. The Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act (43 U.S.C. 1331 et seq.) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sections:

"SEC. 18. OUTER CONTINENTAL SHELF LEASING PROGRAM.—(a) The Secretary, pursuant to procedures set forth in subsections (c) and (d), shall prepare, periodically revise, and maintain an oil and gas leasing program to implement the policies of this Act. The leasing program shall indicate as precisely as possible the size, timing, and location of leasing activity which he determines will best meet national energy needs for the five-year period following its approval or reapproval. Such leasing program shall be prepared and maintained in a manner consistent with the following principles:

"(1) Management of the outer Continental Shelf shall be conducted in a manner which considers economic, social, and environmental values of the renewable and nonrenewable resources contained in the outer Continental Shelf, and the potential impact of oil and gas exploration on other resource values of the outer Continental Shelf and the marine, coastal, and human environments.

"(2) Timing and location of exploration, development, and production of oil and gas among the oil- and gas-bearing physiographic regions of the outer Continental Shelf shall be based on a consideration of—

"(A) existing information concerning the geographical, geological, and ecological characteristics of such regions;

"(B) an equitable sharing of developmental benefits and environmental risks among the various regions;

"(C) the location of such regions with respect to, and the relative needs of, regional and national energy markets;

"(D) the location of such regions with respect to other uses of the sea and seabed, including fisheries, navigation, existing or proposed sealanes, potential sites of deepwater ports, and other anticipated uses of the resources and space of the outer Continental Shelf;

"(E) the interest of potential oil and gas producers in the development of oil and gas resources as indicated by exploration or nomination;

"(F) laws, goals, and policies of affected States which have been specifically identified by the Governors of such States as relevant matters for the Secretary's consideration;

"(G) programs promulgated by coastal States and approved pursuant to the Coastal Zone Management Act of 1972 (16 U.S.C. 1451 et seq.);

"(H) whether the oil and gas producing industry will have sufficient resources, including equipment and capital, to bring about the exploration, development, and production of oil and gas in such regions in an expeditious manner;

"(I) the relative environmental sensitivity and marine productivity of different areas of the outer Continental Shelf; and

"(J) relevant baseline and predictive information for different areas of the outer Continental Shelf.

"(3) The Secretary shall select the timing and location of leasing, to the maximum extent practicable, so as to obtain a proper balance between the potential for environmental damage, the potential for the discovery of oil and gas, and the potential for adverse impact on the coastal zone.

"(4) Leasing activities shall be conducted to assure receipt of fair value for the lands leased and the rights conveyed by the Federal Government.

"(b) The leasing program shall include estimates of the appropriations and staff required to—

"(1) obtain resource information and any other information needed to prepare the leasing program required by this section;

"(2) analyze and interpret the exploratory data and any other information which may be compiled under the authority of this Act;

"(3) conduct environmental baseline studies and prepare any environmental impact statement required in accordance with this Act and with section 102(2)(C) of the National Environmental Policy Act of 1969 (42 U.S.C. 4332(2)(C)); and

"(4) supervise operations conducted pursuant to each lease in the manner necessary to assure due diligence in the exploration and development of the lease area and compliance with the requirements of applicable law and regulations, and with the terms of the lease.

"(c)(1) During the preparation of any proposed leasing program under this section, the Attorney General and the Federal Trade Commission shall report to the Secretary with respect to the effect on competition of outer Continental Shelf exploration, development, and production. Such reports shall analyze competition and individual market shares within regional markets.

"(2) During the preparation of any proposed leasing program under this section, the Secretary shall invite and consider suggestions for such program from any interested Federal agency and from the Governor of any State which may become an affected State under such proposed program. The Secretary may also invite or consider suggestions from any other person.

"(3) After such preparation and at least sixty days prior to publication of a proposed leasing program in the Federal Register pursuant to paragraph (4) of this subsection, the Secretary shall transmit a copy of such proposed program to the Governor of each affected State for review and comment. The Governor shall solicit comments from the executives of local governments in his State affected by the proposed program. If any comment is received by the Secretary at least fifteen days prior to submission to the Congress pursuant to such paragraph (4) and includes a request for any modification of such proposed program, the Secretary shall reply in writing, granting or denying such request in whole or in part, or granting such request in such modified form as the Secretary considers appropriate, and stating his reasons therefor. All such correspondence between the Secretary and the Governor of any affected State, together with any additional information and data relating thereto, shall accompany such proposed program when it is submitted to the Congress.

"(4) Within nine months after the date of enactment of this section, the Secretary shall submit a proposed leasing program to the Congress, the Attorney General, the Federal Trade Commission, the Governors of affected States, and through the Governors, the executives of affected local governments, and shall publish such proposed program in the Federal Register.

"(d)(1) Within ninety days after the date of publication of a proposed leasing program, the Attorney General shall submit comments on the anticipated effects of such proposed program upon competition, and any State, local government, or other person may submit comments and recommendations as to any aspect of such proposed program.

"(2) At least sixty days prior to approving a proposed leasing program, the Secretary shall submit it to the President and the Congress, together with any comments received. Such submission shall indicate why any specific recommendation of the Attorney General or a State or a local government was not accepted.

"(3) After the leasing program has been approved by the Secretary, or after eighteen months following the date of enactment of this section, whichever first occurs, no lease shall be issued unless it is for an area included in the approved leasing program and unless it contains provisions consistent with the approved leasing program, except that leasing shall be permitted to continue until such program is approved and for so long thereafter as such program is under judicial or administrative review pursuant to the provisions of this Act.

"(e) The Secretary shall review the leasing program approved under this section at least once each year, and he may revise and reapprove such program, at any time, in the same manner as originally developed.

"(f) The Secretary shall, by regulation, establish procedures for—

"(1) receipt and consideration of nominations for any area to be offered for lease or to be excluded from leasing;

"(2) public notice of and participation in development of the leasing program;

"(3) review by State and local governments which may be impacted by the proposed leasing;

"(4) periodic consultation with State and local governments, oil and gas lessees and permittees, and representatives of other individuals or organizations engaged in activity in or on the outer Continental Shelf, including those involved in fish and shellfish recovery, and recreational activities; and

"(5) (A) coordination of the program with the management program being developed by any State pursuant to section 305 of the Coastal Zone Mnaagement Act of 1972, and (B) assuring consistency, as provided by the Coastal Zone Management Act, with the program of any State which has been approved pursuant to section 306 of such Act, to the maximum extent practicable.

Such procedures shall be applicable to any revision or reapproval of the leasing program.

"(g) The Secretary may obtain from public sources, or purchase from private sources, any survey, data, report, or other information (including interpretations of such data, survey, report, or other information) which may be necessary to assist him in preparing any environmental impact statement and in making other evaluations required by this Act. Data of a classified nature provided to the Secretary under the provisions of this subsection shall remain confidential for such period of time as agreed to by the head of the department or agency from whom the information is requested. The Secretary shall maintain the confidentiality of all privileged data or information for such period of time as is provided for in this Act, established by regulation, or agreed to by the parties.

"(h) The heads of all Federal departments and agencies shall provide the Secretary with any nonprivileged information and may provide the Secretary with any privileged information he requests to assist him in preparing the leasing program. Privileged information provided to the Secretary under the provisions of this subsection shall remain confidential for such period of time as agreed to by the head of the department or agency from whom the information is requested. In addition, the Secretary shall utilize the existing capabilities and resources of such Federal departments and agencies by appropriate agreement.

"SEC. 19. COORDINATION AND CONSULTATION WITH AFFECTED STATES AND LOCAL GOVERNMENTS.—(a) Any Governor of any affected State or the executive of any affected local government in such State may submit recommendations to the Secretary regarding the size, timing, or location of a proposed lease sale or with respect to a proposed development and production plan.

"(b) Such recommendations shall be submitted within sixty days after notice of such proposed lease sale or sixty days after receipt of such development and production plan.

"(c) The Secretary shall accept recommendations of the Governor and may accept recommendations of the executive of any affected local government if he determines, after having provided the opportunity for full consultation, that they provide for a reasonable balance between the national interest and the well-being of the citizens of the affected State. For the purposes of this subsection, a determination of the national interest shall be based on the desirability of obtaining oil and gas supplies in a balanced manner and on the findings, purposes, and policies of this Act. The Secretary shall communicate to the Governor, in writing, the reasons for his determination to accept or reject such Governor's recommendations, or to implement any alternative means identified in consultation with the Governor to provide for a reasonable balance between the national interest and the well-being of the citizens of the affected State.

"(d) The Secretary's determination that recommendations provide, or do not provide, for a reasonable balance between the national interest and the well-being of the citizens of the affected State shall be final and shall not, alone, be a basis for invalidation of a proposed lease sale or a proposed development and production plan in any suit or judicial review pursuant to section 23 of this Act, unless found to be arbitrary or capricious.

"(e) The Secretary is authorized to enter into cooperative agreements with affected States for purposes which are consistent with this Act and other applicable Federal law. Such agreements may include, but not be limited to, the sharing of information (in accordance with the provisions of section 26 of this Act), the joint utilization of available expertise, the facilitating of permitting procedures, joint planning and review, and the formation of joint surveillance and monitoring arrangements to carry out applicable Federal and State laws, regulations, and stipulations relevant to outer Continental Shelf operations both onshore and offshore.

"SEC. 20. BASELINE AND MONITORING STUDIES.—(a) (1) The Secretary shall conduct a study of any area or region included in any lease sale in order to establish baseline information concerning the status of the human, marine, and coastal environments of the outer Continental Shelf and the coastal areas which may be affected by oil and gas development in such areas or region.

"(2) Each study required by paragraph (1) shall be commenced not later than six months after the date of enactment of this section with respect to any area or region where a lease sale has been held or scheduled before such date of enactment, and not later than six months prior to the holding of a lease sale with respect to any area or region where no lease sale has been held or scheduled before such date of enactment. The Secretary may utilize information collected in any study prior to such date of enactment in conducting any such study.

"(3) In addition to developing baseline information, any study of an area or region, to the extent practicable, shall be designed to predict impacts on the marine biota which may result from chronic low level pollution or large spills associated with outer Continental Shelf production, from the introduction of drill cuttings and drilling muds in the area, and from the laying of pipe to serve the offshore production area, and the impacts of development offshore on the affected and coastal areas.

"(b) Subsequent to the leasing and developing of any area or region, the Secretary shall conduct such additional studies to establish baseline information as he deems necessary and shall monitor the human, marine, and coastal environments of such area or region in a manner designed to provide time-series and data trend information which can be used for comparison with any previously collected data for the purpose of identifying any significant changes in the quality and productivity of such environments, for establishing trends in the areas studied and monitored, and for designing experiments to identify the causes of such changes.

"(c) The Secretary shall, by regulation, establish procedures for carrying out his duties under this section, and shall plan and carry out such duties in full cooperation with affected States. To the extent that other Federal agencies have prepared environmental impact statements, are conducting studies, or are monitoring the affected human, marine, or coastal environment, the Secretary may utilize the information derived therefrom in lieu of directly conducting such activities. The Secretary may also utilize information obtained from any State or local government entity, or from any person, for the purposes of this section. For the purpose of carrying out his responsibilities under this section, the Secretary may by agreement utilize, with or without reimbursement, the services, personnel, or facilities of any Federal, State, or local government agency.

"(d) The Secretary shall consider available relevant baseline information in making decisions (including those relating to exploration plans, drilling permits, and development and production plans), in developing appropriate regulations and lease conditions, and in issuing operating orders.

"(e) As soon as practicable after the end of each fiscal year, the Secretary shall submit to the Congress and make available to the general public an assessment of the cumulative effect of activities conducted under this Act on the human, marine, and coastal environments.

"(f) In executing his responsibilities under this section, the Secretary shall, to the maximum extent practicable, enter into appropriate arrangements to utilize on a reimbursable basis the capabilities of the Department of Commerce. In carrying out such arrangements, the Secretary of Commerce is authorized to enter into contracts or grants with any person, organization, or entity with funds appropriated to the Secretary of the Interior pursuant to this Act.

"SEC. 21. SAFETY REGULATIONS.—(a) Upon the date of enactment of this section, the Secretary, the Secretary of Labor, and the Secretary of the Department in which the Coast Guard is operating shall, in consultation with each other and, as appropriate, with the heads of other Federal departments and agencies, promptly commence a joint study of the adequacy of existing safety regulations, and of the technology, equipment, and techniques available for the exploration, development, and production of the natural resources of the outer Continental Shelf. The results of this study shall be submitted to the President who shall submit a plan to Congress of his proposals to promote safety and health in the exploration, development, and production of the natural resources of the outer Continental Shelf.

"(b) In exercising their respective responsibilities for the artificial islands, installations, and other devices referred to in section 4(a)(1) of this Act, the Secretary, and the Secretary of the Department in which the Coast Guard is operating, shall require, on all new drilling and production operations and, wherever practicable, on existing operations, the use of the best available and safest technology which the Secretary determines to be economically achievable, wherever failure of equipment would have a significant effect on safety, health, or the environment, except where the Secretary determines that the incremental benefits are clearly insufficient to justify the incremental costs of utilizing such technology.

"(c) Nothing in this section or in section 22 of this Act shall affect the authority provided by law to the Secretary of Labor for the protection of occupational safety and health, the authority provided by law to the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency for the protection of the environment, or the authority provided by law to the Secretary of Transportation with respect to pipeline safety standards and regulations.

"(d)(1) In administering the provisions of this section, the Secretary shall consult and coordinate with the heads of other appropriate Federal departments and agencies for purposes of assuring that, to the maximum extent practicable, inconsistent or duplicative requirements are not imposed.

"(2) The Secretary shall make available to any interested person a compilation of all safety and other regulations which are prepared and promulgated by any Federal department or agency and applicable to activities on the outer Continental Shelf. Such compilation shall be revised and updated annually.

"SEC. 22. Enforcement of Environmental and Safety Regulations—

"(a) The Secretary and the Secretary of the Department in which the Coast Guard is operating shall consult with each other regarding the enforcement of environmental and safety regulations promulgated pursuant to this Act, and each may by agreement utilize, with or without reimbursement, the services, personnel, or facilities of any Federal agency, for the enforcement of their respective regulations.

"(b) The Secretary and the Secretary of the Department in which the Coast Guard is operating shall individually, or jointly if they so agree, promulgate regulations to provide for—

"(1) scheduled onsite inspection at least once a year of each facility on the Outer Continental Shelf which is subject to any environmental or safety regulation promulgated pursuant to this Act, which inspection shall include all safety equipment designed to prevent or ameliorate blowouts, fires, spillages, or other major accidents; and

"(2) periodic onsite inspection without advance notice to the operator of such facility to assure compliance with such environmental or safety regulations.

"(c) The Secretary, the Secretary of the Department in which the Coast Guard is operating or their authorized representatives, upon presenting appropriate credentials to the owner or operator of a facility subject to regulations issued pursuant to subsection (b), shall be authorized—

"(1) to enter without delay any part of the facility to conduct an on-site inspection; and

"(2) to examine such documents and records as are pertinent to such an inspection.

"(d)(1) The Secretary or the Secretary of the Department in which the Coast Guard is operating, as applicable, shall make an investigation and public report on each major fire and major oil spillage occurring as a result of operations conducted pursuant to this Act. For the purpose of this subsection, the term 'major oil spillage' means any discharge from a single source of more than two hundred barrels of oil over a period of thirty days or of more than fifty barrels over a single twenty-four hour period. In addition, such Secretary may make an investigation and report of any lesser oil spillage.

"(2) In any investigation conducted pursuant to this subsection, the Secretary of the Department in which the Coast Guard is operating shall have the power to subpoena witnesses and to require the production of books, papers, documents, and any other evidence relating to such investigation.

"SEC. 23. CITIZEN SUITS, COURT JURISDICTION, AND JUDICIAL REVIEW.—(a)(1) Except as provided in this section, any person having a valid legal interest which is adversely affected may commence a civil action on his own behalf to compel compliance with this Act against any person, including the United States, and any other government instrumentality or agency (to the extent permitted by the eleventh amendment to the Constitution) for any alleged violation of any provision of this Act or any regulation promulgated under this Act, or of the terms of any permit or lease issued by the Secretary under this Act.

"(2) Except as provided in paragraph (3) of this subsection, no action may be commenced under subsection (a)(1) of this section—

"(A) prior to sixty days after the plaintiff has given notice of the alleged violation, in writing under oath, to the Secretary and any other appropriate Federal official, to the State in which the violation allegedly occurred or is occurring, and to any alleged violator; and

"(B) if the Secretary or his authorized representative, any other appropriate Federal official, or the Attorney General has commenced and is diligently prosecuting a civil action in a court of the United States or a State with respect to such matter, but in any such action any person having a legal interest which is or may be adversely affected or aggrieved may intervene as a matter of right.

"(3) An action may be brought under this subsection immediately after notification of the alleged violation in any case in which the alleged violation constitutes an imminent threat to the public health or safety or would immediately and irreparably affect a legal interest of the plaintiff.

"(4) In any action commenced pursuant to this section, the Secretary, the Attorney General, or any other appropriate Federal official, if not a party, may intervene as a matter of right.

"(5) A court, in issuing any final order in any action brought pursuant to subsection (a)(1) or subsection (c) of this section, may award costs of litigation, including reasonable attorneys' and expert witness fees, to any party, whenever such court determines such award is appropriate. The court may, if a temporary restraining order or preliminary injunction is sought, require the filing of a bond or equivalent security in a sufficient amount to compensate for any loss or damage suffered, in accordance with the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

"(6) Except as provided in subsection (c) of this section, all suits challenging actions or decisions allegedly in violation of, or seeking enforcement of, the provisions of this Act, or any regulation promulgated under this Act, or the terms of any permit or lease issued by the Secretary under this Act, shall be undertaken in accordance with the procedures described in this subsection. Nothing in this section shall restrict any right which any person or class of persons may have under any other Act or common law to seek appropriate relief.

"(b) Except as provided in subsection (c) of this section, the district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction of cases and controversies arising out of, or in connection with (1) any operation conducted on the outer Continental Shelf which involves exploration, development, or production of the natural resources of the subsoil and seabed of the outer Continental Shelf, or which involves rights to such natural resources, or (2) the cancellation, suspension, or termination of a lease or permit under this Act. Proceedings with respect to any such case or controversy may be instituted in the judicial district in which any defendant resides or may be found, or in the judicial district of the State nearest the place the cause of action arose.

"(c)(1) Any action of the Secretary to approve a leasing program pursuant to section 18 of this Act shall be subject to judicial review only in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

"(2) Any action of the Secretary to approve, require modification of, or disapprove any exploration plan or any development and production plan under this Act shall be subject to judicial review only in a United States court of appeals for a circuit in which an affected State is located.

"(3) The judicial review specified in paragraphs (1) and (2) of this subsection shall be available only to a person who (A) participated in the administrative proceedings related to the actions specified in such paragraphs, (B) is adversely affected or aggrieved by such action, (C) files a petition for review of the Secretary's action within sixty days after the date of such action, and (D) promptly transmits copies of the petition to the Secretary and to the Attorney General.

"(4) Any action of the Secretary specified in paragraph (1) or (2) shall only be subject to review pursuant to the provisions of this subsection, and shall be specifically excluded from citizen suits which are permitted pursuant to subsection (a).

"(5) The Secretary shall file in the appropriate court the record of any public hearings required by this Act and any additional information upon which the Secretary based his decision, as required by section 2112 of title 28, United States Code. Specific objections to the action of the Secretary shall be considered by the court only if the issues upon which such objections are based have been submitted to the Secretary during the administrative proceedings related to the actions involved.

"(6) The court of appeals conducting a proceeding pursuant to this subsection shall consider the matter under review solely on the record made before the Secretary. The findings of the Secretary, if supported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole, shall be conclusive. The court may affirm, vacate, or modify any order or decision or may remand the proceedings to the Secretary for such further action as it may direct.

"(7) Upon the filing of the record with the court pursuant to paragraph (5), the jurisdiction of the court shall be exclusive and its judgment shall be final, except that such judgment shall be subject to review by the Supreme Court of the United States upon writ of certiorari.

"SEC. 24. REMEDIES AND PENALTIES.—(a) At the request of the Secretary, the Attorney General or a United States attorney shall institute a civil action in the district court of the United States for the district in which the affected operation is located for a temporary restraining order, injunction, or other appropriate remedy to enforce any provision of this Act, any regulation or order issued under this Act, or any term of a lease, license, or permit issued pursuant to this Act.

"(b) If any person fails to comply with any provision of this Act, or any term of a lease, license, or permit issued pursuant to this Act, or any regulation or order issued under this Act, after notice of such failure and expiration of any reasonable period allowed for corrective action, such person shall be liable for a civil penalty of not more than $10,000 for each day of the continuance of such failure. The Secretary may assess, collect, and compromise any such penalty. No penalty shall be assessed until the person charged with a violation has been given an opportunity for a hearing.

"(c) Any person who knowingly and willfully (1) violates any provision of this Act, any term of a lease, license, or permit issued pursuant to this Act, or any regulation or order issued under the authority of this Act designed to protect health, safety, or the environment or conserve natural resources, (2) makes any false statement, representation, or certification in any application, record, report, or other document filed or required to be maintained under this Act, (3) falsifies, tampers with, or renders inaccurate any monitoring device or method of record required to be maintained under this Act, or (4) reveals any data or information required to be kept confidential by this Act shall, upon conviction, be punished by a fine of not more than $100,000, or by imprisonment for not more than ten years, or both. Each day that a violation under clause (1) of this subsection continues, or each day that any monitoring device or data recorder remains inoperative or inaccurate because of any activity described in clause (3) of this subsection, shall constitute a separate violation.

"(d) Whenever a corporation or other entity is subject to prosecution under subsection (c) of this section, any officer or agent of such corporation or entity who knowingly and willfully authorized, ordered, or carried out the proscribed activity shall be subject to the same fines or imprisonment, or both, as provided for under subsection (c) of this section.

"(e) The remedies and penalties prescribed in this section shall be concurrent and cumulative and the exercise of one shall not preclude the exercise of the others. Further, the remedies and penalties prescribed in this section shall be in addition to any other remedies and penalties afforded by any other law or regulation.

"SEC. 25. OIL AND GAS DEVELOPMENT AND PRODUCTION.—(a)(1) Prior to development and production pursuant to an oil and gas lease issued after the date of enactment of this section in a frontier area, or issued or maintained prior to such date of enactment with respect to which no oil or gas has been discovered in commercial quantities prior to such date of enactment, the lessee shall submit a development and production plan (hereinafter in this section referred to as a 'plan') to the Secretary, for approval pursuant to this section.

"(2) A plan shall be accompanied by a statement describing all facilities and operations, other than those on the outer Continental Shelf, proposed by the lessee and known by him (whether or not owned or operated by such lessee) which will be constructed or utilized in the development, production, transportation, processing or refining of oil or gas from the lease area, including the location and site of such facilities and operations, the land, labor, material, and energy requirements associated with such facilities and operations, and all environmental and safety safeguards to be implemented.

"(3) Except for any privileged information (as such term is defined in regulations issued by the Secretary), the Secretary, who in ten days after receipt of a plan and statement, shall (A) submit such plan and statement to the Governor of any affected State, and upon request, to the executive of any affected local government, and (B) make such plan and statement available to any other appropriate interstate regional entity and the public.

"(b) After the date of enactment of this section, no oil and gas lease may be issued pursuant to this Act in any frontier area, unless such lease requires that development and production of reserves be carried out in accordance with a plan which complies with the requirements of this section.

"(c) A plan may apply to more than one oil and gas lease, and shall set forth, in the degree of detail established by regulations issued by the Secretary—

"(1) the specific work to be performed;

"(2) a description of all facilities and operations located on the outer Continental Shelf which are proposed by the lessee or known by him (whether or not owned or operated by such lessee) to be directly related to the proposed development, including the location and size of such facilities and operations, and the land, labor, material, and energy requirements associated with such facilities and operations;

"(3) the environmental safeguards to be implemented on the outer Continental Shelf and how such safeguards are to be implemented;

"(4) all safety standards to be met and how such standards are to be met;

"(5) an expected rate of development and production and a time schedule for performance; and

"(6) such other relevant information as the Secretary may by regulation require.

"(d)(1) The Secretary shall at least once in each frontier area declare the approval of a development and production plan or plans to be a major Federal action. In preparing an environmental impact statement on such action the Secretary shall evaluate the cumulative effect on such area and the affected states as a result of actions proposed in the plan or plans submitted for approval, plans previously approved and available preliminary plans for production in the area.

"(2) The Secretary may require lessees of tracts for which development and production plans have not been approved to submit preliminary or final plans for their leases, prior to or immediately after a determination by the Secretary that the procedures under the National Environmental Policy Act of 1969 shall commence.

"(e) If approval of a development and production plan is found to be a major Federal action, the Secretary shall transmit the draft environmental impact statement to the Governor of any affected State, any appropriate interstate regional entity, and the executive of any affected local government area, for review and comment, and shall make such draft available to the general public.

"(f) If approval of a development and production plan is not found to be a major Federal action, the Governor of any affected State, and the executive of any affected local government area shall have sixty days from receipt of the plan from the Secretary to submit comments and recommendations. Such comments and recommendations shall be made available to the public upon request. In addition, any interested person may submit comments and recommendations.

"(g)(1) After reviewing the record of any public hearing held with respect to the approval of a plan pursuant to the National Environmental Policy Act of 1969 or the comments and recommendations submitted under subsection (f) of this section, the Secretary shall, within sixty days after the release of the final environmental impact statement prepared pursuant to the National Environmental Policy Act of 1969 in accordance with subsection (d) of this section, or sixty days after the period provided for comment under subsection (f) of this section, approve, disapprove, or require modifications of the plan. The Secretary shall require modification of a plan if he determines that the lessee has failed to make adequate provision in such plan for safe operations on the lease area or for protection of the human, marine, or coastal environment, including compliance with the regulations prescribed by the Secretary pursuant to paragraph (8) of section 5(a) of this Act. Any modification required by the Secretary which affects land use and water use of the coastal zone of a State with a coastal zone management program approved pursuant to section 306 of the Coastal Zone Management Act of 1972 (16 U.S.C. 1455) shall be consistent with such program unless the Secretary of Commerce makes the finding authorized by section 307(c)(3)(B)(iii) of such Act. The Secretary shall disapprove a plan—

"(A) if the lessee fails to demonstrate that he can comply with the requirements of this Act or other applicable Federal law, including the regulations prescribed by the Secretary pursuant to paragraph (8) of section 5(a) of this Act;

"(B) if those activities described in the plan which affect land use and water use of the coastal zone of a State with a coastal zone management program approved pursuant to section 306 of the Coastal Zone Management Act of 1972 (16 U.S.C. 1455) are not concurred with by such State pursuant to section 307(c) of such Act, and the Secretary of Commerce does not make the finding authorized by section 307(c)(3)(B)(iii) of such Act;

"(C) if operations threaten national security or national defense; or

"(D) if the Secretary determines, because of exceptional geological conditions in the lease area, exceptional resource values in the marine or coastal environment, or other exceptional circumstances, that (i) implementation of the plan would probably cause serious harm or damage to life (including fish and other aquatic life), to property, to any mineral deposits (in areas leased or not leased), to the national security or defense, or to the marine, coastal or human environments, (ii) the threat of harm or damage will not disappear or decrease to an acceptable extent within a reasonable period of time, and (iii) the advantages of disapproving the plan outweigh the advantages of development and production.

"(2)(A) If a plan is disapproved—

"(i) under subparagraph (A) of paragraph (1); or

"(ii) under subparagraph (B) of paragraph (1) with respect to a lease issued after approval of a coastal zone management program pursuant to the Coastal Zone Management Act of 1972 (16 U.S.C. 1455), the lessee shall not be entitled to compensation because of such disapproval.

"(B) If a plan is disapproved—

"(i) under subparagraph (C) or (D) of paragraph (1); or

"(ii) under subparagraph (B) of paragraph (1) with respect to a lease issued before approval of a coastal zone management program pursuant to the Coastal Zone Management Act of 1972, and such approval occurs after the lessee has submitted a plan to the Secretary, the term of the lease shall be duly extended, and at any time within five years after such disapproval, the lessee may reapply for approval of the same or a modified plan, and the Secretary shall approve, disapprove, or require modifications of a plan in accordance with this subsection.

"(C) Upon the expiration of the five-year period described in subparagraph (B) of this paragraph, or, in the Secretary's discretion, at an earlier time upon request of a lessee, if the Secretary has not approved a plan, the Secretary shall cancel the lease. In the case of any lease canceled after disapproval of a plan under such subparagraph (B) which was issued after the date of enactment of this section, the lessee shall be entitled to receive such compensation as he shows to the Secretary is equal to the lesser of—

"(i) the fair value of the cancelled rights as of the date of cancellation taking account of both anticipated revenues from the lease and anticipated costs, including cost of compliance with all applicable regulations and operating orders, liability for cleanup costs or damages, or both, in the case of an oil spill, and all other costs reasonably anticipated with respect to the lease; or

"(ii) the excess, if any, over the lessee's revenues from the lease (plus interest thereon from date of receipt to date of reimbursement) of all consideration paid for the lease and all direct expenditures made by the lessee after the date of issuance of such lease, and in connection with exploration or development, or both, pursuant to the lease (plus interest on such consideration and such expenditures from the date of payment to the date of reimbursement). In the case of any lease cancelled after disapproval of a plan under subparagraph (B) of this paragraph which was issued before the date of enactment of this section, the lessee shall be entitled to receive fair value in accordance with clause (i) of this subparagraph. The Secretary may, at any time within the five-year period described in such subparagraph (B), require the lessee to submit a plan of development and production for approval, disapproval, or modification. If the lessee fails to submit a required plan expeditiously and in good faith, the Secretary shall find that the lessee has not been duly diligent in pursuing his obligations under the lease, and shall immediately cancel such lease, without compensation, under the provisions of section 5(c) of this Act.

"(3) The Secretary shall, from time to time, review each plan approved under this section. Such review shall be based upon changes in available information and other onshore or offshore conditions affecting or impacted by development and production pursuant to such plan. If the review indicates that the plan should be revised to meet the requirements of this subsection, the Secretary shall require such revision.

"(h) The Secretary may approve any revision of an approved plan proposed by the lessee if he determines that such revision will lead to greater recovery of oil and natural gas, improve the efficiency, safety, and environmental protection of the recovery operation, is the only means available to avoid substantial economic hardship to the lessee, or is otherwise not inconsistent with the provisions of this Act, to the extent such revision is consistent with protection of the marine and coastal environments. Any revision of an approved plan which the Secretary determines is significant shall be reviewed in accordance with subsections (d) through (g) of this section.

"(i) Whenever the owner of any lease fails to submit a plan in accordance with regulations issued under this section, or fails to comply with an approved plan, the lease may, after notice to such owner of such failure and expiration of any reasonable period allowed for corrective action, and after an opportunity for a hearing, be forfeited, canceled, or terminated, subject to the right of judicial review, in accordance with the provisions of section 23(b) of this Act. Termination of a lease because of failure to comply with an approved plan, including required modifications or revisions, shall not entitle a lessee to any compensation.

"(j) If any development and production plan submitted to the Secretary pursuant to this section provides for the production and transportation of natural gas, the lessee shall contemporaneously submit to the Federal Power Commission that portion of such plan which relates to production of natural gas and the facilities for transportation of natural gas. The Secretary and the Federal Power Commission shall agree as to which of them shall prepare any environmental impact statement which may be required pursuant to the National Environmental Policy Act of 1969 applicable to such portion of such plan, or conduct studies as to the effect on the environment of implementing it. Thereafter, the findings and recommendations by the agency preparing such environmental impact statement or conducting any studies which they may deem desirable pursuant to that agreement shall be adopted by the other agency, and such other agency shall not independently prepare another environmental impact statement or duplicate such studies with respect to such portion of such plan, but the Federal Power Commission, in connection with its review of an application for a certificate of public convenience and necessity applicable to such transportation facilities pursuant to section 7 of the Natural Gas Act (15 U.S.C. 717), may prepare such environmental studies or statement relevant to certification of such transportation facilities as have not been covered by an environmental impact statement or studies prepared by the Secretary. The Secretary, in consultation with the Federal Power Commission, shall promulgate rules to implement this subsection, but the Federal Power Commission shall retain sole authority with respect to rules and procedures applicable to the filing of any application with the Commission and to all aspects of the Commission's review of, and action on, any such application.

"SEC. 26. OUTER CONTINENTAL SHELF OIL AND GAS INFORMATION PROGRAM.—(a)(1)(A) Any lessee or permittee conducting any exploration for, or development or production of, oil or gas pursuant to this Act shall provide the Secretary access to all data obtained from such activity and shall provide copies of such specific data, and a representative interpretation of any such data, which the Secretary may request. Such data and interpretation shall be provided in accordance with regulations which the Secretary shall prescribe.

"(B) If an interpretation provided pursuant to subparagraph (A) of this paragraph is made in good faith by the lessee or permittee, such lessee or permittee shall not be held responsible for any consequence of the use of or reliance upon such interpretation.

"(C) Whenever any data is provided to the Secretary pursuant to subparagraph (A) of this paragraph—

"(i) by a lessee, in the form and manner of processing which is utilized by such lessee in the normal conduct of his business, the Secretary shall pay the reasonable cost of reproducing such data; and

"(ii) by a lessee, in such other form and manner of processing as the Secretary may request, or by a permittee, the Secretary shall pay the reasonable cost of processing and reproducing such data, pursuant to such regulations as he may prescribe.

"(2) Each Federal department and agency shall provide the Secretary with any data obtained by such Federal department or agency conducting exploration pursuant to section 11 of this Act, and any other information which may be necessary or useful to assist him in carrying out the provisions of this Act.

"(b)(1) Information provided to the Secretary pursuant to subsection (a) of this section shall be processed, analyzed, and interpreted by the Secretary for purposes of carrying out his duties under this Act.

"(2) As soon as practicable after information provided to the Secretary pursuant to subsection (a) of this section is processed, analyzed, and interpreted, the Secretary shall make available to the affected States and to any requesting affected local government, a summary of data designed to assist them in planning for the onshore impacts of possible oil and gas development and production. Such summary shall include estimates of (A) the oil and gas reserves in areas leased or to be leased, (B) the size and timing of development if and when oil or gas, or both, is found, (C) the location of pipelines, and (D) the general location and nature of onshore facilities.

"(c) The Secretary shall prescribe regulations to (1) assure that the confidentiality of privileged information received by the Secretary under this section will be maintained, and (2) set forth the time periods and conditions which shall be applicable to the release of such information. Such regulations shall include a provision that no such information will be transmitted to any affected State unless the lessee, or the permittee and all persons to whom such permittee has sold such information under promise of confidentiality, agree to such transmittal.

"(d)(1) The Secretary shall transmit to any affected State—

"(A) a copy of all relevant actual or proposed programs, plans, reports, environmental impact statements, tract nominations (including negative nominations) and other lease sale information, any similar type of relevant information, and all modifications and revisions thereof and comments thereon, prepared or obtained by the Secretary pursuant to this Act;

"(B)(i) the summary of data prepared by the Secretary pursuant to subsection (b)(2) of this section, and (ii) any other processed, analyzed, or interpreted data prepared by the Secretary pursuant to subsection (b)(1) of this subsection, unless the Secretary determines that transmittal of such data prepared pursuant to subsection (b)(1) would unduly damage the competitive position of the lessee or permittee who provided the Secretary with the information which the Secretary had processed, analyzed, or interpreted; and

"(C) any relevant information received by the Secretary pursuant to subsection (a) of this section, subject to any applicable requirements as to confidentiality which are set forth in regulations prescribed under subsection (c) of this section.

"(2) Notwithstanding the provisions of any regulation required pursuant to the second sentence of subsection (c) of this section, the Governor of any affected State may designate an appropriate State official to inspect, at a regional location which the Secretary shall designate, any privileged information received by the Secretary regarding any activity adjacent to such State, except that no such inspection shall take place prior to the sale of a lease covering the area in which such activity was conducted, nor at any such inspection shall the appropriate State official be permitted to copy or abstract from, or in any way make written notes concerning, the privileged information inspected. Knowledge obtained by such State during such inspection shall be subject to applicable requirements as to confidentiality which are set forth in regulations prescribed under subsection (c) of this section.

"(e) Prior to transmitting any privileged information to any State, or granting such State access to such information, the Secretary shall enter into a written agreement with the Governor of such State in which such State agrees, as a condition precedent to receiving or being granted access to such information, to waive the defenses set forth in subsection (f)(2) of this section.

"(f)(1) Whenever any employee of the Federal Government or of any State reveals information in violation of the regulations prescribed pursuant to subsection (c) of this section, the lessee or permittee who supplied such information to the Secretary or to any other Federal official, and any person to whom such lessee or permittee has sold such information under promise of confidentiality, may commence a civil action for damages in the appropriate district court of the United States against the Federal Government or such State, as the case may be.

"(2) In any action commenced against the Federal Government, or a State pursuant to paragraph (1) of this subsection, the Federal Government or such State, as the case may be, may not raise as a defense (A) any claim of sovereign immunity, or (B) any claim that the employee who revealed the privileged information which is the basis of such suit was acting outside the scope of his employment in revealing such information.

"(g) Any provisions of State or local law which provides for public access to any privileged information received or obtained by any person pursuant to this Act is expressly preempted by the provisions of this section, to the extent that it applies to such information.

"(h) If the Secretary finds that any State cannot or does not comply with the regulations issued under subsection (c) of this section, he shall thereafter withhold transmittal and deny inspection of privileged information to such State until he finds that such State can and will comply with such regulations.

"(i) The regulations prescribed pursuant to subsection (c) of this section, and the provisions of subsection 552(b)(9) of title 5, United States Code, shall not apply to any information obtained in the conduct of geological or geophysical explorations by any Federal agency (or any person acting under a service contract with such agency) pursuant to section 11 of this Act.

"SEC. 27. FEDERAL PURCHASE AND DISPOSITION OF OIL AND GAS.—(a)(1) Except as may be necessary to comply with the provisions of sections 6 and 7 of this Act, all royalties or net profit shares, or both, accruing to the United States under any oil and gas lease or permit issued or maintained under this Act, shall, on demand of the Secretary, be paid in oil or gas.

"(2) Except as otherwise provided in section 12(b) of this Act, the United States shall have the right to purchase not to exceed 16⅔ per centum by volume of the oil and gas produced pursuant to a lease or permit issued under this Act, at the regulated price, or, if no regulated price applies, at the fair market value at the wellhead of the oil and gas saved, removed, or sold except that any oil or gas obtained by the United States as royalty or net profit share shall be credited against the amount that may be purchased under this subsection.

"(3) Title to any royalty, net profit share, or purchased oil or gas may be transferred, upon request, by the Secretary to the Secretary of Defense, to the Administrator of the General Services Administration, or to the Administrator of the Federal Energy Administration, for disposal within the Federal Government.

"(b)(1) The Secretary, pursuant to such terms as he determines and in the absence of any provision of law which provides for the mandatory allocation of such oil in amounts and at prices determined by such provision, or regulations issued in accordance with such provision, may offer to the public and sell by competitive bidding for not more than its regulated price, or, if no regulated price applies, not less than its fair market value any part of the oil (A) obtained by the United States pursuant to any lease as royalty or net profit share, or (B) purchased by the United States pursuant to subsection (a)(2) of this section.

"(2) Whenever, after consultation with the Administrator of the Federal Energy Administration, the Secretary determines that small refiners do not have access to adequate supplies of oil at equitable prices, the Secretary may dispose of any oil which is taken as a royalty or net profit share accruing or reserved to the United States pursuant to any lease issued or maintained under this Act, or purchased by the United States pursuant to subsection (a)(2) of this section, by conducting a lottery for the sale of such oil, or may equitably allocate such oil among the competitors for the purchase of such oil, at the regulated price, or if no regulated price applies, at its fair market value. The Secretary shall limit participation in any lottery or allocated sale to assure such access and shall publish notice of such sale, and the terms thereof, at least thirty days in advance of such sale. Such notice shall include qualifications for participation, the amount of oil to be sold, and any limitation in the amount of oil which any participant may be entitled to purchase.

"(3) Whenever a provision of law is in effect which provides for the mandatory allocation of such oil in amounts or at prices determined by such provision, or regulations issued in accordance with such provision, the Secretary may only sell such oil in accordance with such provision of law or regulations.

"(c)(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2) of this subsection, the Secretary, pursuant to such terms as he determines, may offer to the public and sell by competitive bidding for not more than its regulated price, or, if no regulated price applies, not less than its fair market value any part of the gas (A) obtained by the United States pursuant to a lease as royalty or net profit share, or (B) purchased by the United States pursuant to subsection (a)(2) of this section.

"(2) Whenever, after consultation with and advice from the Administrator of the Federal Energy Administration and the Chairman of the Federal Power Commission, the Secretary determines that an emergency shortage of natural gas is threatening to cause severe economic or social dislocation in any region of the United States and that such region can be serviced in a practical, feasible, and efficient manner by royalty, net profit share, or purchased gas obtained pursuant to the provisions of this subsection, the Secretary may allocate or conduct a lottery for the sale of such gas, and shall limit participation in any allocated or lottery sale of such gas to any person servicing such region, but he shall not sell any such gas for more than its regulated price, or, if no regulated price applies, less than its fair market value. Prior to allocating any gas pursuant to this paragraph, the Secretary shall consult with the Federal Power Commission.

"(d) The lessee shall take any Federal oil or gas for which no acceptable bids are received, as determined by the Secretary, and which is not transferred pursuant to subsection (a)(3) of this section, and shall pay to the United States a cash amount equal to the regulated price, or, if no regulated price applies, the fair market value of the oil or gas so obtained.

"(e) As used in this section—

"(1) the term 'regulated price' means the highest price—

"(A) at which Federal oil may be sold pursuant to the Emergency Petroleum Allocation Act of 1973 and any rule or order issued under such Act;

"(B) at which natural gas may be sold to natural-gas companies pursuant to the Natural Gas Act and any rule or order issued under such Act; or

"(C) at which either Federal oil or gas may be sold under any other provision of law or rule or order thereunder which sets a price (or manner for determining a price) for oil or gas produced pursuant to a lease or permit issued in accordance with this Act; and

"(2) the term 'small refiner' means an owner of an existing refinery or refineries, including refineries not in operation, who qualifies as a small business concern under the rules of the Small Business Administration and who is unable to purchase in the open market an adequate supply of crude oil to meet the needs of his existing refinery capacities.

"(f) Nothing in this section shall prohibit the right of the United States to purchase any oil or gas produced on the outer Continental Shelf, as provided in section 12(b) of this Act.

"SEC. 28. LIMITATIONS ON EXPORT.—(a) Any oil or gas produced from the outer Continental Shelf shall be subject to the requirements and provisions of the Export Administration Act of 1969.

"(b) Before any oil or gas subject to this section may be exported under the requirements and provisions of the Export Administration Act of 1969, the President shall make and publish an express finding that such exports will not increase the number of barrels of oil or cubic feet of gas imported into this country, are in the national interest, and are in accordance with the provisions and requirements of the Export Administration Act of 1969.

"(c) The President shall submit reports to the Congress containing the findings made under this section, and after the date of receipt of such reports Congress shall have a period af sixty calendar days, thirty days of which Congress must have been in session, to consider whether exports under the terms of this section meet the requirements of subsection (b). If both Houses of Congress within such time period pass a resolution of disapproval stating disagreement with any of the President's findings concerning the requirements of subsection (b), further exports made pursuant to such Presidential findings shall cease.

"(d) The provisions of this section shall not apply to any oil or gas which is either exchanged in similar quantity for convenience or increased efficiency of transportation with persons or the government of an adjacent foreign state, or which is temporarily exported for convenience for increased efficiency of transportation across parts of an adjacent foreign state and reenters the United States.

"SEC. 29. RESTRICTIONS OF EMPLOYMENT.—No full time officer or employee of the Department of the Interior who directly or indirectly discharged duties or responsibilities under this Act, and who was at any time during the twelve months preceding the termination of his employment with the Department compensated under the Executive Schedule or compensated at or above the annual rate of basic pay for grade GS–16 of the General Schedule, shall accept, for a period of two years after the date of termination of employment with the Department, employment or compensation, directly or indirectly, from any person, persons, association, corporation, or other entity subject to regulation under this Act.

"SEC. 30. FISHERMEN'S GEAR COMPENSATION FUNDS.—(a) As used in this section, the term—

"(1) 'commercial fisherman' means any citizen of the United States whose primary source of income is derived from the harvesting of living marine resources for commercial purposes; and

"(2) 'fishing gear' means (A) any vessel, and (B) any equipment, whether or not attached to a vessel, which is used in the commercial handling or harvesting of living marine resources.

"(b)(1) The Secretary is authorized to establish and maintain a fishermen's gear compensation fund for any area of the outer Continental Shelf for the purpose of providing reasonable compensation for damages to fishing gear and any resulting economic loss to commercial fishermen due to activities related to oil and gas exploration, development, and production in such area. Such fund may sue or be sued in its own name.

"(2) After the date of enactment of this section, any lease issued by the Secretary to a lessee for a tract in an area of the outer Continental Shelf shall contain a condition that such lessee, upon request by the Secretary, shall pay the amount specified by the Secretary for the purpose of the establishment and maintenance of a fishermen's gear compensation fund for such area. No lessee shall be required by the Secretary to pay in any calendar year an amount in excess of $5,000 per lease.

"(3) For each fishermen's gear compensation fund established under paragraph (1) of this subsection there shall be established within the Treasury of the United States a revolving account, without fiscal year limitation, which shall be available to such fund to make payments pursuant to this section. Amounts collected by the Secretary under paragraph (2) of this subsection for use by such fund shall be deposited in such revolving account. Amounts in such revolving account shall be available for disbursement and shall be disbursed for only the following purposes:

"(A) Administrative and personnel expenses of such fund.

"(B) The payment of any claim in accordance with procedures established under this section for damages suffered in the area for which such fund was established.

"(4) Each fund established for an area of the outer Continental Shelf pursuant to this section shall be maintained at a level not to exceed $100,000 and, if depleted, shall be replenished by equal assessments by the Secretary of each lease holder in such area whose lease was issued after the date of enactment of this section.

"(5) Whenever the amount in a revolving account for a fund is not sufficient to pay obligations for which such fund is liable pursuant to this section, such fund may issue, in an amount not to exceed $1,000,000, notes or other obligations to the Secretary of the Treasury, in such forms and denominations, bearing such maturities, and subject to such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. Such notes or other obligations shall bear interest at a rate to be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury on the basis of the current average market yield on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States of comparable maturities during the month preceding the issuance of such notes or other obligations. Moneys obtained by such fund under this paragraph shall be deposited in the revolving account, and redemptions of any such notes or other obligations shall be made by such fund from the revolving account. The Secretary of the Treasury shall purchase any such notes or other obligations, and for such purpose he may use as a public debt transaction the proceeds from the sale of any securities issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act. The purposes for which securities may be issued under such Act are extended to include any purchase of notes or other obligations issued under this subsection. The Secretary of the Treasury may sell any such notes or other obligations at such times and prices and upon such terms and conditions as he shall determine in his discretion. All purchases, redemptions, and sales of such notes or other obligations by such Secretary of the Treasury shall be treated as public debt transactions of the United States.

"(c)(1) In carrying out this section, the Secretary may—

"(A) prescribe, and from time to time amend, regulations for the filing, processing, and the fair and expeditious settlement of claims pursuant to this section, including a time limitation on the filing of such claims;

"(B) establish and classify all potential hazards to commercial fishing caused by outer Continental Shelf oil and gas exploration, development, and production activities, including all obstructions on the bottom, throughout the water column, and on the surface; and

"(C) establish regulations for all materials, equipment, tools, containers, and all other items used on the outer Continental Shelf to be properly stamped or labeled, wherever practicable, with the owner's identification prior to actual use.

"(2)(A) Payments may be disbursed by the Secretary from the revolving account established for a fishermen's gear compensation fund for any area of the outer Continental Shelf to compensate commercial fishermen for actual and consequential damages, including loss of profits, due to the damage of fishing gear by materials, equipment, tools, containers, or other items associated with oil and gas exploration, development, or production activities in such area.

"(B) Notwithstanding the provisions of subparagraph (A) of this paragraph, no payment may be made by the Secretary from any revolving account established under this section—

"(i) when the damage set forth in a claim was caused by materials, equipment, tools, containers, or other items the ownership and responsibility for which is known;

"(ii) in an amount in excess of $10,000 per claimant for any incident; and

"(iii) to the extent that damages were caused by the negligence or fault of the commercial fisherman making the claim.

"(d)(1) Upon receipt of any notification of a claim under this section, the Secretary shall refer such matter to a hearing examiner appointed under section 3105 of title 5, United States Code. Upon receipt of any notification of a claim under this section, the Secretary shall notify all lessees in the area, and any such lessee may submit evidence at any hearing conducted with respect to such claim. Such hearing examiner shall promptly adjudicate the case and render a decision in accordance with section 554 of title 5, United States Code.

"(2) For the purposes of any hearing conducted pursuant to this section, the hearing examiner shall have the power to administer oaths and subpena the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of books, records, and other evidence relative or pertinent to the issues being presented for determination.

"(3) A hearing conducted under this section shall be conducted within the United States judicial district within which the matter giving rise to the claim occurred, or, if such matter occurred within two or more districts, in any of the affected districts, or, if such matter occurred outside of any district, in the nearest district.

"(4) Upon a decision by the hearing examiner and in the absence of a request for judicial review, any amount to be paid, subject to the limitations of this section, shall be certified to the Secretary, who shall promptly disburse the award. Such decision shall not be reviewable by the Secretary.

"(e) Any person who suffers legal wrong or who is adversely affected or aggrieved by the decision of a hearing examiner under this section may, no later than sixty days after such decision is made, seek judicial review of such decision in the United States court of appeals for the circuit in which the damage occurred, or, if such damage occurred outside of any circuit, in the United States court of appeals for the nearest circuit, or in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

"(f) Notwithstanding any other provision of this title, no authority to enter into contracts, to incur obligations, or to make payments under this title shall be effective except to the extent or in such amounts as are provided in advance in appropriation acts.

(a) There is hereby established in the Treasury of the United States in Offshore Oil Pollution Compensation Fund, not to exceed $200,000,000, except that such limitation shall be increased to the extent necessary to permit any moneys recovered or collected which are referred to in subsection (b)(2) and (3) of this section being paid into such fund. The fund shall be administered by the Secretary and the Secretary of the Treasury, as specified in this section. The fund may sue and be sued in its own name.

"(b) The fund shall be constituted from—

"(1) all fees collected pursuant to subsection (d);

"(2) all moneys recovered on behalf of the fund under section 308; and

"(3) all other moneys recovered or collected on behalf of the fund, under this title.

"(c) In addition to the processing and settlement of claims under section 307, the fund shall be immediately available for the removal costs described in section 301(w)(1), and the Secretary is authorized to promulgate regulations designating the person or persons who may obligate available money in the fund for such purposes.

"(d)(1) The Secretary shall levy and the Secretary of the Treasury shall collect a fee of not to exceed 3 cents per barrel on oil obtained from the Outer Continental Shelf, which shall be imposed on the owner of the oil when such oil is produced.

"(2) The Secretary of the Treasury, after consulting with the Secretary, may promulgate reasonable rules and regulations relating to the collection of the fees authorized by paragraph (1) and, from time to time, the modification thereof. Modifications shall become effective on the date specified therein, but no earlier than the ninetieth day following the date the modifying regulation is published in the Federal Register. Any modification of the fee shall be designed to insure that the fund is maintained at a level not less than $100,000,000 and not more than $200,000,000. No regulation that modifies fees, nor any modification of such a regulation, whether or not in effect, may be stayed by any court pending completion of judicial review of that regulation or modification. "(3)(A) Any person who fails to collect or pay fees as required by the regulations promulgated under paragraph (2) shall be liable for a civil penalty not to exceed $10,000, to be assessed by the Secretary of the Treasury, in addition to the fees required to be collected or paid and the interest on those fees at the rate the fees would have earned if collected or paid when due and invested in special obligations of the United States in accordance with subsection (e)(2). "(c) In a case where—the claimant may elect to commence an action in court against the owner, operator, or guarantor, or to present the claim to the fund, that election to be irrevocable and exclusive.

"(d) In the case of a claim presented in accordance with subsection (a), where full and adequate compensation is unavailable, either because the claim exceeds a limit of liability invoked under section 304(b) or because the owner, operator, and guarantor are financially incapable of meeting their obligations in full, a claim for the uncompensated damages may be presented to the fund,

"(e) In the case of a claim which has been presented to any person, pursuant to subsection (a), and which is being presented to the fund, pursuant to subsection (c) or (d), such person, at the request of the claimant, shall transmit the claim and supporting documents to the fund. The Secretary may, by regulation, prescribe the documents to be transmitted and the terms under which they are to be transmitted.

"(j)(1) In any action brought against an owner, operator, or guarantor, both the plaintiff and defendant shall serve a copy of the complaint and all subsequent pleadings therein upon the fund at the same time those pleadings are served upon the opposing parties.

"(2) The fund may intervene in the action as a matter of right.

"(3) In any action to which the fund is a party, if the owner, operator, or guarantor admits liability under this title, the fund upon its motion shall be dismissed therefrom to the extent of the admitted liability.

"(4) If the fund receives from either the plaintiff or the defendant notice of such an action, the fund shall be bound by any judgment entered therein, whether or not the fund was a party to the action.

"(5) If neither the plaintiff nor the defendant gives notice of such an action to the fund, the limitation of liability otherwise permitted by section 304(b) of this title is not available to the defendant, and the plaintiff shall not recover from the fund any sums not paid by the defendant.

"(B)(i) If, in any fiscal year, any coastal state will not receive a grant under subparagraph (A) or (B) of paragraph (2), the Secretary shall make a grant to such coastal state in an amount equal to 2 per centum of the total amount available for making grants to all states under such paragraph (2) in such fiscal year if any other coastal state in the same region is receiving a grant under either such subparagraph in such fiscal year.

"(ii) For purposes of this subparagraph—

"(I) the states of Connecticut, Delaware, Georgia, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, and Virginia (the Atlantic coastal states) shall constitute one 'region';

"(III) the states of California, Oregon, and Washington (the Pacific coastal states) shall constitute one 'region'; and

"(IV) the state of Alaska shall constitute one 'region'.

"(C) If, in any fiscal year, the total amount of funds available for making grants to coastal states pursuant to this subsection is greater than the total amount of grants payable to such states pursuant to this subsection, the difference between such two amounts shall remain in the Treasury of the United States and be credited to miscellaneous receipts.

"(D) If, in any fiscal year, the total amount of funds available for making grants to coastal states pursuant to this subsection is less than the total amount of grants payable to all coastal states pursuant to this subsection, there shall be deducted from the amount payable to each coastal state an amount equal to the product of—

"(i) the amount of which the total amount of grants payable to all coastal states exceeds the total amount of funds available for such grants; multiplied by

"(ii) a fraction, the numerator of which is the amount of grants payable to such coastal state in such fiscal year and the denominator of which is the total amount of grants payable to all coastal states in such fiscal year.".

(c) Paragraph (5)(B)(i) of such section 308(b) (as renumbered by subsection (b) of this section) is amended—

(1) by striking out "necessary, because of the unavailability of adequate financing under any other subsection," and inserting in lieu thereof "necessary"; and

After obtaining such assurances, the Secretary shall disburse the proceeds of such grants to such coastal state.

"(7) Any coastal state which receives proceeds of any grant under this subsection only may expend or commit such proceeds—

"(A) after a determination by the Secretary that such proceeds will be expended or committed by such state in accordance with the purposes set forth in paragraph (5) of this subsection; and

"(B) before the close of the fiscal year immediately following the fiscal year in which the proceeds were received.

"(8) The United States shall be entitled to recover from any coastal state an amount equal to all or any portion of a grant made to such state under this subsection which is not expended or committed in compliance with paragraph (7) of this subsection.".

Each such report shall be submitted to the Comptroller General and shall indicate why each well is shut-in or flaring natural gas, and whether the Secretary intends to require production on such a shut-in well or order cessation flaring.

(b) Within six months after receipt of the Secretary's report, the Comptroller General shall review and evaluate the methodology used by the Secretary in allowing the wells to be shut-in or to flare natural gas and submit his findings and recommendations to the Congress.

REVIEW AND REVISION OF ROYALTY PAYMENTS

As soon as feasible but no later than ninety days after the date of enactment of this Act, and annually thereafter, the Secretary of the Interior shall submit a report or reports to the Congress describing the extent, during the two-year period preceding such report, of delinquent royalty accounts under leases issued under any Act which regulates the development of oil and gas on Federal lands, and what new auditing, post-auditing, and accounting procedures have been adopted to assure accurate and timely payment of royalties and net profit shares. Such report or reports shall include any recommendations for corrective action which the Secretary of the Interior determines to be appropriate.

NATURAL GAS DISTRIBUTION

SEC. 503. The Federal Power Commission shall, pursuant to its authority under section 7 of the Natural Gas Act, permit any natural gas distributing company which engages, directly or indirectly, in development and production of natural gas from the Outer Continental Shelf to transport to its service area for distribution any natural gas obtained by such natural gas distributing company from such development and production. For purposes of this section, the term "natural gas distributing company" means any person (1) engaged in the distribution of natural gas at retail, and (2) regulated or operated as a public utility by a State or local government.

ANTIDISCRIMINATION PROVISIONS

SEC. 504 Each Federal agency or department given responsibility for the promulgation or enforcement of regulations under this Act or the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act shall take such affirmative action as deemed necessary to assure that no person shall, on the grounds of race, creed, color, national origin, or sex, be excluded from receiving or participating in any activity, sale, or employment conducted pursuant to the provisions of this Act or the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act. The agency or department shall promulgate such rules as it deems necessary to carry out the purposes of this section, and any rules promulgated under this section, through agency and department provisions and rules which shall be similar to those established and in effect under title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

SUNSHINE IN GOVERNMENT

SEC. 505. (a) Each officer or employee of the Department of the Interior who—

(1) performs any function or duty under this Act or the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act, as amended by this Act; and

(2) has any known financial interest in any person who (A) applies for or receives any permit or lease under, or (B) is otherwise subject to, the provisions of this Act or the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act,

INVESTIGATION OF AVAILABILITY OF OIL AND NATURAL GAS FROM THE OUTER CONTINENTAL SHELF

SEC. 506. (a) The Congress hereby finds that—

(1) there is a serious lack of adequate basic energy information available to the Congress and the Secretary of the Interior with respect to the availability of oil and natural gas from the Outer Continental Shelf;

(2) there is currently an urgent need for such information;

(3) the existing collection of information by Federal departments and agencies relevant to the determination of the availability of such oil and natural gas is uncoordinated, is jurisdictionally limited in scope, and relies too heavily on unverified information from industry sources;

(4) adequate, reliable, and comprehensive information with respect to the availability of such oil and natural gas is essential to the national security of the United States; and

(5) this lack of adequate reserve data requires a reexamination of past data as well as the acquisition of adequate current data.

(b) The purpose of this section is to enable the Secretary of the Interior and the Congress to gain the best possible knowledge of the status of Outer Continental Shelf oil and natural gas reserves, resources, productive capacity, and production available to meet current and future energy supply emergencies, to gain accurate knowledge of the potential quantity of oil and natural gas resources which could be made available to meet such emergencies, and to aid in establishing energy pricing and conservation policies.

(c) The Secretary of the Interior shall conduct a continuing investigation, based on data and information which he determines has been adequately and independently audited and verified, for the purpose of determining the availability of all oil and natural gas produced or located on the Outer Continental Shelf.

(d) The investigation conducted pursuant to this section shall include, among other items—

(1) an independent determination of the MER (maximum efficient rate) and MPR (maximum production rate) in relation to the actual production from the fields, reservoirs, and wells on the Outer Continental Shelf commencing with production during the twelve-month period immediately prior to the date of enactment of this section, and an independent estimate indicating whether production from such fields, reservoirs, and wells has been less than the maximum efficient rate and maximum production rate, and, if so, the reason for such difference;

(2) an independent estimate of total discovered reserves (including proved and indicated reserves) and undiscovered resources (including hypothetical and speculative resources) of Outer Continental Shelf oil and natural gas by fields and reservoirs;

(3) a determination of the utilization of Outer Continental Shelf oil and natural gas in terms of end-use markets so as to ascertain the consumpton by different classes and types of end users:

(4) the relationship of any and all such information to the requirements of conservation, industry, commerce, and the national defense; and

(5) an independent evaluation of trade association estimates of Outer Continental Shelf reserves, ultimate recovery, and productive capacity since 1965 which shall be accompanied by a detailed description of procedures used by such associations and the manner in which their data relates to the results yielded in the investigation under this section. In order to provide maximum opportunity for evaluation and continuity, the Secretary of the Interior shall obtain all of the available data and other records which the trade associations have used in compiling their data with respect to reserves.

(e) The Secretary of the Interior shall, not later than six months after the date of enactment of this section, submit an initial report to the Congress on the results of the continuing investigation required under this section and shall submit subsequent reports annually thereafter. The initial report shall include cost estimates for the separate components of the continuing investigation and a time schedule for meeting all of its specifications. The schedule shall provide for producing all the required information within a year after the date of enactment of this section. The Secretary of the Interior shall make separate reports on past data as follows:

(1) within six months after the date of enactment of this section, on the acquisition and details of trade association data and information; and

(2) within twelve months after such date, an evaluation of the trade association materials, and within eighteen months after such date, the relationship between trade association data and the new data collected under this section.

(f) The Secretary of the Interior shall consult with the Federal Trade Commission regarding categories of information acquired pursuant to this section. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary of the Interior shall, upon request of the Federal Trade Commission, make available to such Commission any information acquired under this section.

(g) For purposes of this section, the term "Outer Continental Shelf" has the meaning given such term in section 2(a) of the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act.

STATE MANAGEMENT PROGRAM

SEC. 507. Section 307(c)(3)(B)(ii) of the Coastal Zone Management Act of 1972 (16 U.S.C. 1456(c)(3)(B)(ii)) is amended to read as follows:

"(ii) concurrence by such state with such verification is conclusively presumed as provided for in subparagraph (A), except that the time period after which such concurrence shall be presumed shall be three months; or".

RELATIONSHIP TO EXISTING LAW

SEC. 508. Except as otherwise expressly provided in this Act, nothing in this Act shall be construed to amend, modify, or repeal any provision of the Coastal Zone Management Act of 1972, the National Environmental Policy Act of 1969, the Mining and Mineral Policy Act of 1970, or any other Act.

RECOMMENDATIONS FOR TRAINING PROGRAM

SEC. 509. Not later than 90 days after the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary of the Interior, in consultation with the Secretary of the Department in which the Coast Guard is operating, shall prepare and submit to the Congress a report which sets forth the recommendations of the Secretary for a program to assure that any individual—

(1) who is employed on any artificial island, installation or other device located on the Outer Continental Shelf; and

(2) who, as part of such employment, operates, or supervises the operation of pollution-prevention equipment, is properly trained to operate, or supervise the operation of such equipment, as the case may be.

RULE AND REGULATION REVIEW

SEC. 510. (a) Any rule or regulation prescribed pursuant to this Act or the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act, as amended by this Act, by the head of any Federal department or agency may by resolution of either House of Congress be disapproved, in whole or in part, if such resolution of disapproval is adopted not later than the end of the first period of 60 calendar days when Congress is in session (whether or not continuous) which period begins on the date such rule or regulation is finally adopted by the head of such department or agency. The head of any Federal department or agency who prescribes such a rule or regulation shall transmit such rule or regulation to each House of Congress immediately upon its final adoption. Upon adoption of such resolution of disapproval by either House of Congress within such 60-day period, such rule or regulation, or part thereof, as the case may be, shall cease to be in effect.

(b) Congressional inaction on or rejection of a resolution of disapproval of a rule or regulation promulgated under this Act or the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act, as amended by this Act, shall not be deemed an expression of approval of such rule or regulation.

(c) The provisions of this section shall not apply to any finding or action by the Secretary of the Interior pursuant to section 8(a)(5)(C)(ii) or 8(b)(4) of the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act, as amended by this Act.

By Mr. SANTINI:

HUBERT H. HUMPHREY INSTITUTE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS ASSISTANCE ACT

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, the introduction of a bill in this body is often a routine matter involving little emotion and only passing interest. Today, however, I introduce a bill which is of very special interest to me and, I think, to the people of this Nation.

S. 2452 authorizes $5 million in Federal grant funds for the Hubert H. Humphrey Institute of Public Affairs. It is being introduced in the House today in a bipartisan way by Congressman WILLIAM FORD of Michigan and Congressman ALBERT QUIE of Minnesota. I hope that all of my colleagues join me in supporting this bill as a fitting tribute to the public service of our departed colleague, Hubert H. Humphrey.

Clearly this is not only a bipartisan, but a national bill honoring a man who, as we have recently seen, was loved and respected throughout this land by people of every economic and social level. Hubert Humphrey was a hero of representative government for whom respect always crossed political party lines.

We need only recall the scene in the Capitol Rotunda just 2 weeks ago where two former Presidents and a former Vice President, all Republicans, joined a Democratic President and Vice President and many of us in paying their respects to Hubert. But love and respect for Senator Humphrey came not only from the leadership of this country, but also from the common people of this land who he loved and whose interests he represented in this body for 23 years.

Tens of thousands of people gathered here in the Capitol to pass by his bier, saluting the humanity and decency of this man, unequalled in his accomplishments as a modern public servant. When he returned home to Minnesota, thousands more braved the cold, coming from all parts of the Midwest, to say thank you and goodby.

Mr. President, what Hubert Humphrey meant in life has in a small way been institutionalized at the Institute at the University of Minnesota bearing his name. The Hubert H. Humphrey Institute "will be dedicated to the education, stimulation, and recruitment of bright young men and women for positions in public and community service."

As one of his last requests, this Institute will be the main memorial to Senator Humphrey. Nothing could be more fitting. For all of his life, Hubert Humphrey was a teacher and a guiding force who led young people into public service. It was true of my own life as it was true of Vice President MONDALE, Congressman DONALD FRASER, and literally hundreds of others. In every State of this Union, there are people in elective and community service because of Hubert Humphrey.

Now, with his physical presence gone, this Institute will become a national resource in his tradition. Hubert was firm in his belief that expenditures in education were an investment in the future.

At the Hubert Humphrey Institute, there will be substantial scholarships to attract the brightest and most creative young people to training which will make them leaders of this country in future years. An effort is being made by the Institute to "attract persons of national and international stature, recognized for their thinking, writing, and activities on the large questions of public concern."

In a way that Hubert Humphrey has approved, "a fund will be established to make grants to faculty and advanced students needing support for research projects in public policy and planning. The fund will also support the development of applied research projects for local officials and political units."

The abstract study of our political system is important, but Hubert was always a man who wanted to get things done, who wanted this country to move ahead to become a better society, a "good society."

Our help in funding this Institute through the passage of S. 2452 will insure that it will be able to accomplish what was the cornerstone of Hubert's philosophy as it was of our Founding Fathers: The pursuit of the public happiness.

The importance and value of the Hubert Humphrey Institute has been recognized by people in this country who have already contributed $5 million and impressively by the foreign governments of Japan and Iran who have contributed $1,250,000. Other governments are now in the process of determining their contributions and it is expected that they will soon total several additional millions of dollars.

Can we do less, we who have so directly benefited from the immense intellect of Hubert Humphrey, we who have learned from him, followed his wisdom and leadership, shared his energy and ideas? I think not.

There is ample precedent for S. 2452. In various ways, we have honored, by Federal expenditure, the memories of Wayne Morse, Dwight Eisenhower, Herbert Hoover, Harry S. Truman, Allen Ellender, Woodrow Wilson, Lyndon Johnson, and John Kennedy.

Each of those programs the Congress has supported have brought direct benefit to our Nation from the study of its institutions and from the encouragement of young men and women to participate in government and community service. I believe the Hubert Humphrey Institute of Public Affairs will uniquely add to this tradition.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to support S. 2452. I ask unanimous consent that the text of the Hubert H. Humphrey Institute of Public Affairs Assistance Act be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Hubert H. Humphrey Institute of Public Affairs Assistance Act."

SEC. 2. In recognition of the public service of Senator Hubert H. Humphrey, the Commissioner of Education (hereafter in this Act referred to as the "Commissioner") is authorized to make grants in acordance with the provisions of this Act to assist in the development of the Hubert H. Humphrey Institute of Public Affairs, located at the University of Minnesota, Minneapolis-St. Paul.

SEC. 3. No payment may be made under this Act except upon an application at such time, in such manner, and containing or accompanied by such information as the Commissioner may require

SEC. 4. There are authorized to be appropriated such sums, not to exceed $5,000,000 as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act. Funds appropriated pursuant to this Act shall remain available until expended.

By Mr. YOUNG:

S. 2453. A bill to amend title XIX of the Social Security Act to provide that optional State coverage for medically needy individuals may be limited to those individuals under age 18; to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. President, I am introducing a bill at the request of Mr. T. N. Tangedahl, executive director of the North Dakota Social Service Board and North Dakota State Senator David Nething, which I believe has great merit.

Federal regulations currently permit States to provide coverage under medicaid to all medically needy individuals under age 21 or to limit medical assistance to "reasonable classifications" of these individuals, who are not otherwise eligible for assistance under the Aid to Families with Dependent Children or the Supplemental Security Income programs. The North Dakota Legislature during its last session, passed a bill to extend medical assistance benefits to children under the age of 18. However, they have not been able to implement this badly needed and very worthwhile program because the Department of Health, Education and Welfare in its regulations states, with questionable legal authority, that it is unreasonable to provide this assistance to a group of individuals based on age.

My bill will give the States the option of limiting this assistance to those individuals below the age of 18. I feel this legislation is warranted since the age of majority has been lowered to 18 and similar State options exist in other programs.

By Mr. INOUYE:

S. 2454. A bill to amend the Fishery Conservation and Management Act of 1976 in order to provide the Northern Marianas with representation on the Western Pacific Regional Fisheries Management Council; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to amend the Fishery Conservation and Management Act of 1976, in order to provide the Northern Marianas with representation on the Western Pacific Regional Fisheries Management Council.

The Fishery Conservation and Management Act of 1976 (P.L. 94–265) established a fishery conservation zone 200 nautical miles wide around the coasts of the United States, within which this country will exercise exclusive management authority over fisheries.

The act also established eight regional fishery management councils, each of which is responsible for developing a management plan for each fishery in the fishery conservation zone of its respective region. These management plans are recommended by the councils to the Secretary of Comerce, who implements them by appropriate regulations, enforced by the Coast Guard and the National Marine Fisheries Service.

Section 302 of the act specifies which States and territories shall make up each of the regional councils, the Western Pacific Council is defined as consisting of the State of Hawaii, Guam and American Samoa; and by virtue of section 101 of the act, and the definition given in section 3, there is a 200-mile fishery conservation zone offshore of each of the States, commonwealths, territories and possessions of the United States.

The Western Pacific Fishery Management Council has 11 voting members of which 7 are appointed by the Secretary, and of these 7 at least 1 comes from each of the 3 districts. The Northern Marianas Islands have nonvoting representation at the council meetings.

The Northern Marianas Islands are a group of 14 volcanic Islands extending North of Guam, and are geographically and ethnically a part of the same archipelago. The Northern Marianas is in the process of changing its status from that of a district of the trust territory of the Pacific Islands to that of a commonwealth of the United States. This is a process with many steps, and it will not be completed until at least 1981. However, along the way the Northern Marianas will gradually assume a number of the attributes and responsibilities of a self-governing part of the United States.

As I understand it, a number of U.S. statutes which apply to Guam will also automatically become applicable to the Northern Marianas, once the constitution of the new commonwealth has received Federal approval. Among those statutes is the Fishery Conservation and Management Act. The Constitution has been approved and according to NOAA, the Fishery Conservation and Management Act became effective for the Northern Marianas on January 9 of this year.

According to the Fishery Conservation and Management Act, as it stands at present, the situation will then be that there will be a 200-mile fishery conservation zone extending the whole length of the Marianas group and covering about 300,000 square miles of ocean. It will become illegal for foreigners to fish in those waters without a permit from the United States after the act takes effect for the Northern Marianas.

The Northern Marianas will then be in a status similar to that of Wake Island or Johnston Island or any of a number of small U.S. possessions without permanent human populations. That is, there will be a zone of exclusive U.S. fishery jurisdiction, but there will be no provision for any systematic local contribution to the task of managing the fisheries and fishery resources within that zone.

The Northern Marianas are an extensive island group with a native population of more than 12,000. The people of the Northern Marianas see the development of fishery resources as one of their hopes for economic growth. The fishery conservation zone, as noted above, will be very extensive and contain important resources. The zone will be contiguous to that of Guam, with which the Northern Marianas have strong economic and cultural ties.

The people of the Northern Marianas, through representatives who have participated informally in the meetings of the Western Pacific Fishery Council, have evinced a strong interest in joining the council system, so that they can be represented in management decisions affecting their fisheries and gain the full benefits of the Fishery Conservation and Management Act. It does not seem reasonable that they, having chosen to throw in their lot with the United States, should be denied the chance to have a voice in the management of their fisheries, on an equal basis with Samoa, Guam, and Hawaii.

Accordingly, the legislation I am introducing today would amend section 302(a)(8) of the Fishery Conservation and Management Act by adding the name of the Northern Marianas after Hawaii, American Samoa, and Guam and increasing the voting membership to 13, including 8 appointed by the Secretary of Commerce pursuant to subsection (b)(1)(C). This will provide for the Northern Marianas to seat on the council their chief fishery administration official, ex officio, and one member nominated by their Chief Executive and appointed by the Secretary of Commerce. This would give them the same representation as American Samoa, which in terms of population and the state of development of their fisheries would seem appropriate.

By Mr. BIDEN:

S. 2455. A bill to amend the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933 to authorize Federal savings and loan associations to invest in reverse annuity mortgage loans, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

HOMEOWNER'S EQUITY ACT

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, it gives me pleasure to introduce the Homeowner's Equity Act. This legislation, would enable millions of American homeowners aged 65 and over, to enjoy the fruits of the equity which they have put into paying for and maintaining their homes.

Although Congress has passed many good programs to aid our senior citizens, too often we have concentrated on improving the lot of those older Americans who live in rental housing or nursing homes, while overlooking the fact that most older Americans still live in their own homes. It is estimated that 75 percent of the population over 65 live in their own homes. Many of these persons have adequate incomes, others do not.

For some of our senior citizens, a home represents their only major asset. Yet, for these citizens the home can also be a burden. Although the rent is free, taxes, insurance, utilities, and maintenance can funnel away dollars needed for other necessities. Some of our elderly try to save money by fixing their homes themselves, but home maintenance cannot replace an old furnace nor repair a leaky roof. Outside repair work is necessary and the money must be saved by skimping on food or health care or other necessities.

Other homeowners who are fortunate enough to have sufficient income to cover the cost of basic necessities may not have enough income to fully enjoy their years of retirement. Travel, hobbies and other recreational pursuits may have to be curtailed because they are unaffordable luxuries. Consequently, what should be the "golden years" of one's life, may turn out to be a tarnished bronze.

Mr. President, the bill I am introducing today will make it possible for homeowners aged 65 and over to regain some of the equity which they have earned from their homes during their lifetime. My bill would allow federally chartered savings and loan associations to make reverse annuity mortagages.

A reverse annuity mortage is an agreement between a lender and a homeowner whereby the lender will advance a lumpsum loan or a series of installment payments to the homeowner. The homeowner may then use this additional income to travel, fix up the house or for whatever purpose he wishes. The homeowner does not repay the loan until he dies, whereupon the loan is repaid out of the estate. If the homeowner sells the home before his death, the loan becomes repayable at the time of the sale. The security for this loan is the equity in the home which the homeowner has. The reverse annuity mortgage allows the homeowner to enjoy an increased income and at the same time retain the right to live in one's own home without fear of eviction. This is a concept which Prof. Jack Guttentag of the University of Pennsylvania has worked on and one which I believe is a good idea.

Under the present system, it is difficult for a similar type of arrangement to be worked out. Conceivably, a borrower may take out a second mortgage loan. But this second mortgage must be repaid during the lifetime of the borrower. So in effect, the borrower is giving back with one hand what he had been receiving in the other. The conventional loan mechanism may also be inadequate because of the reluctance of lenders to loan large sums to borrowers over 65. Other senior citizens have no desire to get into debt at an advanced age in their life.

Reverse annuity mortgages do not require amortization during the lifetime of the borrower, which may make it easier for senior citizens to obtain such loans. The terms of a reverse annuity mortgage may also be adjusted to meet the individual needs of the borrower. If a homeowner wishes to retain greater residual equity in his home, a smaller loan or annuity may be offered. The borrower may also arrange to receive one lump-sum payment or a series of monthly or annual payments. Arrangements may also be worked out to obtain a deferred annuity which may yield greater payments over a shorter period of time. One of the major advantages of the reverse annuity mortgage is its flexibility.

This is not a "handout" bill, but one which allows homeowners to enjoy the equity which they have earned. The reverse annuity mortgage works within the framework of existing lending institutions. Savings and loan associations would be responsible for orginating the loans. The repayment of the loans would occur using customary estate procedures. Government intervention should not be necessary to originate reverse annuity mortgages.

In conclusion, Mr. President, although reverse annuity mortgages are not going to solve all the income problems of older homeowners, I believe this legislation is a step in the right direction. I think it is important that we consider proposals which will enhance the flexibility of the private marketplace. The Homeowner's Equity Act is one such proposal and I look forward to working on it.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Home Owners' Equity Act".

SEC. 2. Section 5(c) of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933 (12 U.S.C. 1464(c)) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following undesignated paragraph:

"Without regard to any other provision of this subsection, other than the dollar amount limitation and the area restriction, any such association is authorized to invest in reverse annuity mortgage loans in accordance with such regulations as the Board may prescribe. As used in this paragraph, the term 'reverse annuity mortgage loan, means a nonamortized loan which is secured by a first lien on the principal residence of a mortgagor who is at least 65 years of age, and which is repayable upon the death of the mortgagor, or upon any disposition of the property securing the loan, whichever first occurs.".

By Mr. LAXALT:

S. 2458. A bill relating to grazing fees imposed with respect to the use of certain public lands; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

GRAZING FEES ON PUBLIC LANDS

Mr. LAXALT. Mr. President, today, I am introducing legislation which would determine grazing fee levels on public lands. Until passage of the Federal Land Policy and Management Act in 1976, grazing fees were established under law and policy by the appropriate official under rather broad congressional guidelines. Section 401(a) of the BLM Organic Act mandates a study of grazing fees including a study of fees based on the cost of production.

On October 21, 1977, the Secretaries of Interior and Agriculture submitted a report to Congress which recommended an upward adjustment in grazing fees charged for domestic livestock grazing on public lands. The report submitted by the Secretaries rejected fees based on cost of production and recommended continuation of the principles of the current 1969 fee system with slight modifications.

Mr. President, the Public Lands and Resources Subcommittee of the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources held hearings this morning on Senate Resolution 311 and S. 2297, legislation regarding a grazing fee moratorium. I was pleased to cosponsor both of these measures, but, in my view, a moratorium on grazing fee increases is only appropriate if Congress intends to enact legislation to provide an alternative method for determining grazing fees. With this view in mind, I am pleased to introduce this measure which would fix into statute a formula which would determine grazing fee levels on public lands that takes into consideration the cost of production normally associated with domestic livestock grazing in the Western States as well as livestock prices. This formula was recommended by the Technical Committee to Review Public Land Grazing Fees. This formula was recommended in the light that provides for a consistent and efficient method of pricing the public grazing resources.

The 11 Western States had about 18 percent of the beef cattle in the January 1, 1977, inventory. However, about one-half of the livestock in the Western States are on public lands administered by the Forest Service or the BLM and, while the Western States do not dominate the Nation's livestock industry, public land grazing is a highly significant portion of total grazing in some Western States. For example, about 68 percent of the total cattle in Nevada graze at least part of the time on public lands.

Each increase in grazing fees raises operating costs and reduces operators' returns, because a rancher has little control over the price he can demand for his product. So, in essence, each increase in grazing fees must be deducted from his profit.

To further emphasize the significance of grazing fee increases, it should be noted that cash flow problems often plague ranch owners—much more so than other businesses that have control over production and delivery schedules. Even a small increase in grazing fees can have serious impacts on some ranchers even to the extent of forcing some ranches out of business.

It is important to note that some rural communities throughout the Western States, as well as Nevada, have relied heavily on the livestock industry for their economic base. Major reductions in the size and profitability of the cattle industry could hurt these communities.

Mr. President, the present method of determining grazing fees arrives at fair market value by using the private lands lease rate survey. This data collection method has been attacked for many years by agricultural economists and even Federal land officials themselves.

A good example of the inadequacy of this plan is to look at Nevada's input into this survey. Nevada has over 900 permittees using the public lands. The following responses by year were used in Nevada to help determine what grazing fees should be:

1972—8 responses used.
1973—8 responses used.
1974—8 responses used.
1975—9 responses used.
1976—0 responses used.
1977—0 responses used.

Thus, in the last 2 years, Nevada's private pasture rate has not even been determined. Arizona's responses are similar. These two States have 26.2 percent of the total AUM's on the Federal lands.

Another recurring theme is that public grazing lands are of poorer quality than private lands. Public land grazing requires more acres to support an animal, thus significantly reducing weight gains and increasing costs, because of larger areas to fence and manage. Additionally, the rancher generally maintains the roads, develops water, and salts the land for the benefit of both livestock and wildlife.

Mr. President, I feel it is absolutely necessary that balancing factors be contained in a new grazing fee formula. The formula recommended by the Grazing Fee Technical Committee includes these balancing factors. In my view, this formula, Mr. President, will be equitable both to the United States, as mandated by the Federal Land Policy and Management Act of 1976, and to the grazers on Federal lands. For further clarification, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the report of the Grazing Fee Technical Committee which was published in the Federal Register on February 4, 1977, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Special attention is directed to the following provisions of the Federal Land Policy and Management Act of 1976 (Pub. L. 94–579);

SECTION 102(a). The Congress declares that it is the policy of the United States that

(9) The United States receive fair market value of the use of the public lands and their resources unless otherwise provided for by statute;

SECTION 401(a). The Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior shall jointly cause to be conducted a study to determine the value of grazing on the lands under their jurisdiction in the eleven western States with a view to establishing a fee to be charged for domestic livestock grazing on such lands which is equitable to the United States and to the holders of grazing permits and leases on such lands. In making such study, the Secretaries shall take into consideration the costs of production normally associated with domestic livestock grazing in the eleven western States, differences in forage values, and such other factors as may relate to the reasonableness of such fees. The Secretaries shall report the result of such study to the Congress not later than one year from and after the date of approval of this Act, together with recommendations to implement a reasonable grazing fee schedule based upon such study. If the report required herein has not been submitted to the Congress within one year after the date of approval of this Act, the grazing fee charge then in effect shall not be altered and shall remain the same until such report has been submitted to the Congress. Neither Secretary shall increase the grazing fee in the 1977 grazing year.

SUMMARY

The Technical Committee to Review Public Land Grazing Fees was formed by a Memorandum of Understanding on July 12, 1976 between ERS, USDA,; SRS, USDA; FS, USDA; and BLM, USDI. The committee was formed to prepare a report on "Public Land Grazing Fees." The specific tasks of the Technical Committee were:

A. To examine the present procedures for establishing grazing fees.

B. To examine the several alternatives which have been proposed as replacement or modification for all or portions of present procedure.

C. Identify available or additional secondary data which might enhance the present or alternative procedures for determining fees.

The review was conducted within existing administrative mandates that a fair market value fee must be collected and that permit value would not be considered a valid cost factor for determining public land grazing fees.

In order that the review be helpful in resolving, or reducing the controversy about grazing fees, two meetings were held so that the various interest groups could present their views on the public land grazing fee issue, suggested alternatives, and factors to be considered and/or clarified.

Evaluation of the existing system of fee determination or the suggested alternatives requires a criteria for comparison. Although there is no obvious way to determine what is "fair," it can be shown the the competitive norm satisfies the conditions of a welfare ideal. Few economists would claim that pure competition does or ever has existed, but it does provide a logical starting place for evaluation of great many economic problems. The competitive norm incorporates the efficiency concept of equimarginal resource returns, where the value of a resource is determined by its value in use.

The 1969 system (the method used during the 1969–1976 period for grazing fee determination by the BLM and FS) includes three major elements. The first is the economic model and data collection survey used to establish the fair market value fee level of 1966. Second is the ten-year adjustment of grazing fees from previous levels to the fair market value. Third, the procedure used to make annual adjustments in the fair market value. Nearly all of the controversy surrounding the grazing fees issue is with the adjustment factor. The procedure involves adjusting the 1966 base fee of $1.23 to current values by the Index of Private Land Lease Rates in the eleven Western States for dry land range.

A number of alternatives have been suggested by various groups to update or adjust the base fair market value fee of $1.23. Although each proposal is different they all bear the same basic concept, and that is adjustments should be made by changes in the price of output relative to changes in the price of inputs. The formula most often suggested was a Beef Price Index minus a Cost of Production Index. Other suggestions include arbitrary constraints on yearly adjustments or the use of moving averages.

A major concern at the external meetings was the quality of the data used to compute the Index on Private Land Lease Rates. There was also concern about the components of cost that were included in the Prices Paid Index (to be used as Cost of Production Index) as well as a redundancy between the Beef Price Index and the Prices Paid Index. The committee suggested that data on private land lease rates could be improved if it were collected on probability list frame sample that included only livestock operators instead of on a general Farm Report questionnaire. New questions were also suggested for the data collected. The Prices Paid Index could be improved by eliminating a number of cost items not relevant to western range livestock production. The redundancy in the Beef Price Index could be eliminated by excluding calves.

With a history of a market economy for all other products and resources used in agriculture, the obvious solution would be a competitive bidding system for the used of the public range. However, tenure arrangements, institutional goals, management restriction, and location of grazing lands has effectively eliminated the competitive requirement. Therefore less efficient administered pricing schemes must be developed. The task of the Technical Committee then became one of recommending the proper "proxi" for the competitive bid.

Adjusting grazing fees using the Index of Private Land Lease Rates (current method) may best be described as the comparative market approach. It is based on the premise that an individual will not pay more for the use of a resource than his next best alternative, or conversely, the owner of a resource should receive a value equivalent to that which could be realized from the next best alternative use of that resource. The committee felt that the index was a good indicator of long term adjustments taking place in western range livestock industry. It duplicates economic adjustments in the competitive sector, and is the only alternative suggested or discussed that incorporates measures of technical efficiency. Improvements made in the data collection process and discussed in the previous section should eliminate concern about the relevancy and accuracy of the data. However, the Technical Committee was concerned about the ability of the index to reflect short-run instabilities that result during periods of demand, supply and price disequilibrium. In the past this index has failed to account for short-run instabilities.

The combined index (Beef Price Index minus the Prices Paid Index) was rejected by the committee as the only adjustment factor in the grazing fee fromula because it does not respond to long-run adjustments in resource use or efficiency, and would result in a declining real rent over time. However, it was felt that the combined index did reflect short-run instabilities in the value of the range resource.

Recognizing the strengths and the weakness of the current formula as well as the alternative formulas, the Technical Committee recommended the following formula for determining grazing fees levels on public lands:

P = The reconstructed Index of Beef Prices minus the Prices Paid Index (selected items only).

This formula is recommended in the light that it provides for a consistent and efficient method of pricing the public grazing resources. The long-run trend is based on the value of the alternative resource while at the same time accounting for short-run instabilities in either livestock prices or input prices. The committee has further recommended an improvement in the data collection procedures on the private land lease rates. Some modification was also suggested for the Prices Paid Index to make it more accurately reflect western range livestock operations.

I. INTRODUCTION

The Technical Committee to Review Public Land Grazing Fees was formed by a Memorandum of July 12, 1976, in response to the request of Subcommittee on Environment and Land Resources, Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, United States Senate, at the April 30, 1976 Committee Hearings on S. 3071. This report of the Technical Committee is transmitted to the Assistant Secretary for Conservation, Research and Education, U.S. Department of Agriculture; Assistant Secretary, Land and Water Resources, U.S. Department of the Interior; and Director of Agricultural Economics, U.S. Department of Agriculture.

The purpose of the review is to reconsider and examine the present 8-year-old formula for determining grazing fees in light of the criticism directed at it and the alternatives proposed.

The review by the Technical Committee:

A. Examines the present procedures for establishing grazing fees in light of recent criticism, and in light of its fulfillment of expectations in 1968–69.

B. Examines the several alternatives which have been proposed as replacement or modification for all or a portion of present procedures.

C. Identifies available or additional secondary data which might enhance the present or alternative procedures for determining fees.

The Analysis by the Technical Committee:

A. Determines the validity of various fee procedure proposals relative to the existing system and the existing Administration mandates.

B. Indicates combinations of data or procedures which are compatible with existing Administration mandates.

C. Indicates the ranking of the several proposals based on economic criteria.

D. Indicates useable data in modification of existing procedures.

E. Provides the basis for decision within the Administration on further action regarding fees.

II. LIMIT OF SCOPE

The review was conducted within existing administration mandates that a fair market value fee must be collected (BOB, Circular No. A–25) and permit value would not be considered a valid cost factor for determining public land grazing fees. The collection of new primary data was not to be included in the study. However, the need for new studies and/or collection of primary data could be a conclusion of the review. The review and analysis was limited to a search of and use of available secondary data. New tabulation of existing data, new indexes, improved methods of collection of data for existing data series, or new use of existing data were considered.

External consultations

In order for this review to be helpful in resolving, or reducing the controversy about grazing fees, it must serve to increase general understanding as well as meet technical criteria. The livestock industry, through the American National Cattlemen's Association and the Public Lands Council, was fully informed and involved in defining the nature and extent of this Review of Grazing Fees. The appropriate professionals of the Western universities were informed and involved. The environmental concerns were kept appraised through the National Wildlife Federation and the Wildlife Management Institute.

A meeting was held in Denver, Colorado, on August 25, 1976. A second meeting was held in Washington, D.C., on September 20, 1976. At both meetings participants from the above listed interest groups presented their views on the public land grazing fee issue.

III. CRITERIA FOR DETERMINING FAIR MARKET VALUE OF PUBLIC GRAZING

An expression currently in vogue with younger people goes "whatever is fair", or a slightly different expression, "fair is fair". Like many slang expressions it does not have a precise dictionary definition, but its use connotation translates roughly "if you are satisfied, I'm satisfied". In short, "fair" expresses mutual satisfaction between parties involved. The key word is mutual. Fair also suggests justice or equity.

Economists have found no obvious way to determine what is "fair". Welfare comparisons would be relatively simple if it were possible to aggregate the utilities of individuals into a single utility function. However welfare comparisons of individual utilities are possible only in a very restricted sense. It is reasonable to postulate that social welfare transcends the more restricted notion of economic welfare, but for obvious reasons this analysis will be restricted to the latter.

Economic efficiency, often called Pareto optimality, states that the distribution of consumer goods and productive inputs are optimal if any feasible reallocation of goods or inputs causes a reduction in the satisfaction or output of any individual or firm. It can be shown that a perfectly competitive equilibrium satisfies these conditions, and thus perfect competition is a welfare ideal in this sense. Efficiency in the consuming and producing sectors implies further that the allocation of resources is pareto-optimal throughout the economy.[1]

A difficulty with the concept of economic efficiency or Pareto optimality as a welfare criteria is that it accepts the prevailing income distribution, i.e. return to resources. It is conceivable that the norm of perfect competition could lead to a condition in which the majority of individuals lived at subsistence or below. The analysis of welfare in terms of perfect competition leaves a considerable amount of indeterminancy in the solution. This indeterminancy results from the acceptance of the criteria that an increase in welfare was unambiguously defined as an increase in one individuals position without being accompanied by a deterioration in the position of another. This indeterminancy can only be removed by further value judgments.

An economic norm

The above discussion stresses the inability of economic analysis to handle a welfare criterion outside of the norm of economic efficiency. To do otherwise would require value judgments or ethical considerations outside the subject of economic analysis.

Few economists would claim that pure competition does or has ever existed in the United States economy. However, pure competition provides a logical starting place if one is to understand imperfect competition. Further it has been shown that a considerable amount of competition does exist, particularly in agriculture. and that the theory of pure competition gives valid answers to a great many economic problems.[2] Lastly the pure competition model provides a norm or ideal from which to appraise the workings of the economic system. In the latter sense it is often used for regulation of imperfectly structured sectors of the economy, such as public utilities, as well as many other public policy measures.

[2] The assumptions of pure and perfect competition are given in most introductory texts in Economics and will not be elaborated on at this time.

The term competition is used rather ambiguously in economic literature as well as in ordinary conversation. To many people the term commonly denotes rivalry. Whereas, when used along with the term pure or perfect, it takes on a different meaning. From the illustration and previous discussion competition implies mutual satisfaction, fair market value, and efficient resource allocation.

Resource pricing under pure competition

Pure competition in the resource market implies a number of conditions: One, no single firm controls enough of any given resource to be able to influence its price; two, no one supplier of a resource can place enough on the market to influence its price; and three, resources are mobile and can move between different uses and its prices are flexible.

How, then, are resources valued in production? Let us look at the simultaneously pricing and output of decisions involved in the use of a variable resource in the organization of production, Suppose two ranchers living in the same community, one with an excess of summer forage, the other badly in need of more summer forage. Further they know of each others problem. Rancher Tom, who needs more forage, goes to rancher Ray to see about renting some of his summer pasture.

"Ray", says Tom, "would you consider renting me some pasture for the summer, I need some grazing for one of my cows? I'd pay you $60 for the privilege."

Ray thinking to himself that the extra grass is only worth about $5 if he used it replies, "sure Tom glad to help out."

Tom was willing to pay $60 for the privilege while Ray figured it was only worth $5 in its existing use. Both men were satisfied and felt that a "fair" deal had been reached.

The bargaining is not over yet though. Ray having rented up a unit of summer grazing found he didn't have such an excess of pasture anymore. Tom's problem on the other hand was not so urgent anymore, as he didn't find himself in the same need for summer pasture. An additional unit of summer pasture is now only worth $40 to Tom. Trading of grazing privilege for rent would continue between Tom and Ray until eventually the forage was of equal value to both ranchers. In other words, the last unit traded would have equal marginal value to both Tom and Ray in production. Thus, a mutually advantageous trading situation had been achieved, and maximum efficiency had been attained by both. No further trading of grazing privileges would be advantageous to either party. The equimarginal principle has been achieved.

In a free competitive market for forage, both Tom and Ray would trade grazing privileges for cash rent until a "fair" market value had been reached by both parties. In addition, an efficient allocation of resource would have resulted. Generalizing from this simple illustration it may be said that the principle of equimarginal value in use asserts that an efficient allocation of forage has been attained when no mutually advantageous exchanges are possible between any pair of claimants.

Theoretically, the manager combines his resources such that the marginal value product or each resource is equal to the marginal value product of all other resources used in production. The attempt is to combine all of his resources (e.g., land, labor, capital) in such a manner that the productive values of the last unit of each resource added are all equal. To maximize profit, the manager organizes resources such that the marginal value product of each resource is equal to each other and to the marginal revenue received from the last unit of output. This procedure is called the equimarginal principle and can be defined by a simple formula:

(1) $MVP_a = MVP_b = MVP_c = MC_x = MR_x - P_x$

where:

MVP_i = marginal value product of the ith resource in production.

MC_x = sum of the marginal value products of the ith resources combined to produce output x, or the equivalent of marginal costs of production of the $x_{(i)_h}$ output.

MR_x = marginal revenue of the last unit of output x.

P_x = market price of output x.

In a competitively structured society the organization of production is determined by the principal forces of supply and demand. This basic framework along with the decisions of the human agents involved and tempered by the intensities created by time, form, and place lead to a reasonably efficient duality of resource pricing and allocation. This has been particularly true in agriculture because of the absence of barriers to entry (except high capital requirements), homogenity of the product between firms of like output, agriculture's atomistic structure, and the relative mobility of resources both into and out of agriculture. A large number of research studies have verified the long-run efficiency of agriculture.

The real world

The discussion to this point has considered only the "ideal" resource pricing and allocation system. Economic efficiency and the assumptions of a competitive system were discussed, as well as reference to U.S. agriculture industry generally conforming to these standards. Theoretically agriculture should be efficiently organized, at least in the long-runs adjustments period, and few people familiar with U.S. agricultural production would argue its resource and technological efficiency.

However, production levels, resource allocation and pricing has not been so efficient in the short-run adjustment period for many sectors in agriculture. Animal production, and in particular the primary production level for both beef and lamb have demonstrated relatively inefficient production adjustments in the short-run when measured against the neoclassical model which was described as the "ideal" system.

Twenty years ago Glen Johnson and others postulated the theory of fixed assets; where a fixed asset is defined as one for which the marginal value productivity of a resource in its present use neither justified acquisition of more of it, or its disposition. Acquisition cost is what a farm or ranch operator would have to pay in order to acquire more of a particular productive asset. Salvage value is what the operation would get for the asset if it were sold rather than used in production. Neoclassical theory, which defines the equimarginal principle, assumes that markets are such that a manager can purchase more of an asset if it were profitable and that he can dispose of unwanted quantities at the same price. This is tantamount to saying that a firm will continue to produce in the short-run as long as it realizes a return on its variable resources, or stated differently, a firm in the very short-run can survive with no return to its most fixed assets if its cash flow is adequate to cover variable expenses. However, the difference between the theory of fixed assets and neoclassical theory is that resources usually considered variable in production actually become fixed in their present use. For example, labor and capital are normally considered variable resources. However, at primary production levels these variable inputs actually become fixed to the firm because their alternative use outside of production can temporarily drop as far as zero. The value in use that would be expected to accrue to these resources is often used by managers to bid up the use value (returns) of resources that have continued to remain variable. In the theory of fixed assets Johnson has pinpointed the reason for extremely inelastic or irreversible supply functions during periods of decreasing marginal revenue.[3]

Let us examine some of the components of argiculture and in particular the primary production level of livestock that lead to this type of behavior during periods of decreasing product price levels.

First, the combination of resources used in the production process are not discrete, but a bundle or package of resources. Marginal changes in revenue may not cause an adjustment in output levels or resource use because the bundle of resources cannot easily be separated. For example, the physical amount of labor available to the operator may be fixed over a rather large range of production, but the use value of the labor is variable. The balance between summer and winter forage may be unalterable at least in the short-run. If a shortage of summer pasture should occur the firm may be forced to bid up the value of this resource while simultaneously taking smaller returns on the remaining resources in the bundle, even in the face of decreasing marginal revenue for their product.

Second, variable resources become fixed because of the length of the production process. The primary reason for this is the time required for the biological process for plant and animal production. It may take two or more years from the time a market stimulus is received at the primary production level until actual output adjustments can be achieved. Time requirements for an increase in production can take three years or more for obvious reasons. The time aspects alone could cause inelastic short-run adjustment in resource use and output levels.

Third, the demand curve faced by the firm is perfectly elastic while that of the industry is inelastic. Individual firms fail to adjust output levels in the short-run, because of the atomistic structure of the industry.

Fourth, the duality aspect of the price system may work imperfectly. The role of price as a mechanism of trade is generally regarded as extremely efficient; However, the role of price as an organizer of production generally lacks the same performance standard. The problem may be that the human agent may be unable to bridge the gap from present product prices to expected price levels in the future. This lack of adjustment is closely related to length of the production process.

In summary, this discussion has pointed out some of the reasons the competitive or "ideal" system leads to short-run imperfections regarding resource valuation at the primary production levels of agriculture. The principle reason cited was the concept of the fixity of assets. While the competitive norm accurately values resources in the long-run, it has some shortcomings in the short-run adjustment period. Short-run instabilities have a significant effect on the value of resources used in production. In the case of administered prices, failure to recognize potential imperfections in the price norm results in windfall gains and losses. During periods of increasing marginal revenue the government would fail to receive full fair market value for its range resources. Conversely during periods of decreasing marginal revenues the government may charge in excess of fair market value for the range resource. The equimarginal principal states that the value of a resource is determined by its value in use.

IV. CONDITIONS, ASSUMPTIONS AND ISSUES

The Committee uses the concept of an animal-unit-month (AUM) throughout the report. An AUM is the amount of forage consumed by a cow-calf unit during one month. Other livestock are converted to the AUM equivalent. However, the concept is extended to recognize that with the forage the consuming animal unit also has use of a habitat, a place to live. This habitat includes the forage, watering facilities, fencing and other improvements necessary to make the range usable by livestock and to provide for control of the livestock.

Institutional goals

It is the objective of the Forest Service and BLM to contribute to the economic stability of individual ranch units to the fullest extent possible and consistent with protection of the resource and its long term productivity This has resulted in establishment of policies which allocated grazing privileges based on:

A. Prior use;

B. Dependency, or the need for forage to round out a yearlong livestock enterprise;

C. Commensurability, the ability to carry livestock on home ranch lands during the time they were not on public lands; and

D. 10-year, renewable grazing privileges.

The effect of these actions is to maintain long term availability and use of public land associated with a given ranch unit. These provisions allow the operator to plan long-term enterprise development and investment.

Community stability

Grazing of livestock, under permit, on the Public Lands has a substantial impact on the rural communities associated with that grazing. The greater the percentage of land held in Federal ownership, the more the area or communities' basic economic activity relies on use of Federal land, and the greater the impact of Federal policies on the total economic activity and stability of those rural communities.

Conservation and economic efficiency of resource use

Direct involvement in the development and long term use of land resources is generally considered to provide incentives for protection and economic development of the resource. Essentially, security of tenure provides the ability to plan ahead for a reasonable length of time with some degree of certainty.

Relationship of fees to total complex of uses of public lands

Commercial enterprises using the public lands all pay fees which are intended to be the equivalent of fair market value. The only users exempt from payment of fair market value are those involved in individual or group activities primarily for personal enjoyment.

Adjustments in cost structure needed to reflect government requirements and environmental adjustment

It is claimed that there has been relative changes in the FS/BLM non-fee grazing cost over the private land leasing costs over the past eight years. The three most cited examples of increasedd cost to the rancher grazing on public lands are:

(1) Increased animal (sheep) losses because of restricted coyote control on public lands,

(2) Agency requirements for increased rancher participation in structure maintenance, and

(3) Agency requirement for increased participation of ranchers in grazing management practices.

If these claims were in fact true, then the next logical step would be to determine the magnitude of the cost change and make the corresponding corrections in the non-fee grazing cost which would increase combined federal grazing cost and reduce the base fair market value of $1.23 per AUM.

The fundamental basis for the claim of increased sheep losses due to predatation is the restrictions placed on some coyote control practices on public lands. While some individual rancher losses may have increased, there are no substantive data to quantify the claim. Also, the non-fee public grazing costs are weighted by corresponding AUM's for sheep and cattle and any increase in sheep cost would have limited effect on the weighted average.

The Federal agency policy for rancher participation in maintenance of livestock facilities has not changed. There has however been an increase in the application of the maintenance policy in some range areas that previously were not fully affected by maintenance requirements. In recent years it has been BLM policy not to encourage the rancher to construct facilities on public lands because of possible multiple use management conflicts. Again, there are no quantifying data to support the contention that relative changes have taken place in the over-all project maintenance and depreciation costs between private and Federal grazing lands.

The third item relates to increased emphasis placed on intensive grazing management of rangelands and usually associated with some "system" of grazing control. These grazing systems or management plans usually require the movement of livestock several times during the grazing season between pastures to insure that multiple use objectives are met and the physiological needs of the desirable vegetation are taken care of. While some increased operating cost may be incurred there are direct compensating benefits to the rancher of increased stocking date ctability, decreased livestock conflicts with wildlife habitat requirements, improved range conditions and usually increased animal production. Increasing numbers of ranchers are leading the way in intensifying grazing management efforts on private lands so the condition is not unique to public lands. The costs and benefits to the public land user resulting from intensive management cannot be identified in this review.

V. EXISTING AND SUGGESTED ALTERNATIVES FOR FEE DETERMINATIONS

The 1969 fee system (the current method used for grazing fee determination by the BLM and the FS) includes three major elements. The first is the economic model and data collection survey used to establish the fair market value fee level or 1966. Second is the ten year adjustment of grazing fees from previous levels to the fair market value level. Third, the procedure used to make annual adjustments in the fair market value.

The economic model and grazing survey of 1946

The economic model was designed to measure the value of grazing on public lands through a detailed comparison of grazing costs on public and privately owned leased lands. The model is based on the premise that the total on-the-range costs of grazing on public lands and on private owned leased lands should be equal and would represent a means for determining fair market value of public grazing. The public grazing fee would be the amount necessary to equalize the private land lease plus the on-range-cost of using the public lands.[4] In other words the public grazing fee would equal the private lease rate minus the difference in costs incurred in using public range versus private range.

The economic model, because it required only data from operating livestock production units eliminated most of the influence of non-livestock grazing related values, and only measured the level of total costs operators were willing to incur in leasing privately owned land for grazing purposes. The model specifically measures the different and varying requirements placed on the leasee or permittee by both the private and Government landowner. The model measured the value of contributions required by either landowner, including the requirement for construction, repair, replacement and maintenance of permanent improvements.

The data for use in the model were collected by the Statistical Reporting Service in 1966. Ten thousand (10,000) individuals were interviewed and over 14,000 questionnaires were completed. Interviewees included Forest Service and BLM grazing permittees, ranchers who leased private land, and lending institutions.

The data were analyzed by a Technical Committee composed of representatives of the Statistical Reporting Service, Economic Research Service, Forest Service, Bureau of Land Management, and the Bureau of the Budget (now Office of Management and Budget). The Technical Committee came to the following conclusions: first, the data did not provide a basis for differential fees between Forest Service and BLM. The data could be combined and single fee established for BLM and Forest Service grazing: two, the data did not provide a basis for establishing separate fees for cattle and sheep; three, the data and analysis provided a basis for a public land grazing fee of $1.23 per animal unit month.

The conclusion of the Technical Committee provided the basis for the establishment of $1.23 per AUM as the fair market value grazing fee level for 1966 on public lands in the West.

Ten year adjustment period

In order to minimize the impact of adjusting from BLM's 33 cent fee in 1966, and Forest Service's average fee of 51 cents, a 10-year schedule was developed for adjusting to the $1.23 fee level. By spreading the increase in fees over a period of time, the initial impact of the fee increase on the permittees would be minimized and allow a normal adjustment to this increase. The Forest Service starting in 1969 would add 7.2 cents to the fee charged in 1966 for each of the next ten years. BLM would add nine cents to the fee charged in 1966 for each of the next ten years. The result would be that by 1978 both FS and BLM would be at the 1966 fair market value figure of $1.23.

Adjustments in fair market value

Adjustments to the fair market value level of $1.23/AUM in 1966 were necessary to reflect changes overtime in the profitability of range livestock production and prevent future inequities between federal grazing fees and the value of the range forage for grazing use. The base fee was adjusted annually with an index of private grazing land lease rates for the 11 Western states. The private grazing land lease rate is the charge per head per month for pasturing cattle on privately owned lands. The actual values are converted to an index (1964–68=100) in order to measure the rate of change in this price series. The index is then applied to the 1966 base of $1.23.

[4] Specific items compared for differences in the cost of grazing on public lands compared to private lands include: Lost animals, Association fee, veterinary, moving livestock to and from allotment, herding, salt and feed, personal travel to and from allotment, water, horse, fence maintenance, water maintenance, development, depreciation, other costs, and private lease rate.

The private land-lease rate was selected for the adjustment factor because: one, it was an existing and available data series; and two, it represented changes in the economic value of grazing use. It is representative of the economic value of grazing because it is established by the amounts livestock producers are willing to offer for the use of available private grazing lands. Given these conditions, it is expected that these offers represent the value of grazing to the livestock producers.[5]

Alternative fee systems

A number of alternatives have been suggested by various groups to update or adjust the base fair market value fee of $1.23. Although each proposal is different they all have the same basic concept. This concept is that adjustments in the base value ($1.23) should be related to changes in the price of inputs. The procedure intends that when the change in value (price) of products (beef cattle) is larger than changes in price of inthe product and to changes in the price of puts (cost of production), then fees should increase. If the change in costs exceeds the change in product value, then the fee should decrease.

(BPI–PPI+100=CI)

This formula would replace the private land-lease rate formula for the necessary update adjustments for the 1966 base, and for lack of a better name is called the Combined Index. In this formula BPI is an index of the weighted average annual prices for beef cattle, excluding calves, for the 11 Western States. The base would be 1964–68=100. The Prices Paid Index (PPI) is an index of prices paid by farmers for commodities and services, interest, taxes and farm wages as collected and published by the Statistical Reporting Service, in "Agricultural Prices." The index would be adjusted to the base of 1964–68=100.

Another suggested alternative using the Combined Index as a replacement for the private land-lease rate would be that the data would represent a simple moving average. This would have the effect of reducing the impact of large yearly variations in the level of grazing fees.

A third suggested alternative would be to add the combined index to the currently used index of private land lease rates. In this formula, when divided by two, fifty percent of the change in the lease fair market value ($1.23) would result from the private land-lease rate index and fifty percent from the combined index.

Santini formula

This set of alternatives uses the combined index, but also replaces the $1.23 base for fair market value in 1966 with other value(s) for 1975. The Santini formula would establish two groups of grazing lands based on carrying capacity of the public lands. The constant or base figure for Group I lands is $1.70 and for Group II lands $1.40 per animal unit month (AUM).

A version of the above, called the Modified Santini Formula, would make adjustments using the combined index, but the base would be $1.51, the average grazing fee charged in 1976 by BLM and FS.

The Hansen formula, which was contained in S. 3071, is the same as the Santini Formula except the Beef Price Index would be computed using prices for the 48 states and the PPI and the BPI would be a moving three-year simple average.

Economic relief formula

The economic relief formula (so named for lack of an alternative) uses the current formula based on $1.23 and the private land-lease rate index, with a separate analysis of the PPI and BPI or some similar indices, to trigger needed adjustments in the current fee due to stress economic conditions as indicated by the BPI and PPI analysis.

A number of other alternatives have been suggested to limit the impact of large changes in economic conditions. One suggestion was to limit the amount of increase that could occur in any period by a fixed percentage. Another suggestion was to incorporate a rolling three-year average into the existing formula.

Discussion

Most all of the alternatives proposed have merit, and suggest the interest and responsibility of users of and those interested in the use of the public lands. All of the alternatives proposed including the current system have advantages and disadvantages. In other words, there is no perfect lease arrangement, but only better or worse arrangements. This may explain the large variability of lease arrangements in effect around the country between landlord and leasee. Logic and reasonableness does, however, provide a basis for reducing, if not eliminating, conflict between interested parties. The task of this technical committee is to consider the alternatives in light of the economic criteria and recommend a method for determining a fair market value.

VII. DATA SOURCES

A primary objective of this committee was to identify existing data sources and/or refinements to existing data sources, and/or additional data that might be collected to enhance the present or alternative procedures for determining grazing fees.

A major concern at the external group meetings was the quality of the data that are used to compute the index on private land lease rates. There was also concern about the components of cost that were included in the prices paid index, as well as a possible redundancy in the beef price index and the prices paid index.

Private land lease rates

The Statistical Reporting Service, USDA currently obtains information on the average rate for pasturing cattle on non-irrigated privately owned lands on a per head per month basis. The survey is a nonprobability survey; data is collected in March each year on a general Farm Report questionnaire. The table below indicates the number of responses to the question on pasturing cattle on privately owned non-irrigated pasture land for 11 Western states for the years 1967–75.

The SRS Farm Report Questionnaire is mailed to a non-probability general purpose list, including grain farmers, dairy farmers, fruit farmers, etc. In the 11 Western States, approximately 12,500 questionnaires are mailed in March. The question on pasturing cattle on privately owned non-irrigated land is summarized and provided to the Economic Research Service, USDA for analysis and publication. Forest Service, USDA and Bureau of Land Management, U.S. Department of Interior, use these data in adjusting the range forage index each year based on an average head-month rental of $3.65 for the 1964–68 period equal to 100. The adjusted RFI for each year is the 11-State average head-month rental for that year divided by the $3.65 AUM average.

DATA IMPROVEMENT

The Statistical Reporting Service currently has operational two mid-year probability surveys in the 11 Western States. One of the mid-year surveys is a cattle multiple frame survey that utilizes a list frame with a non-response follow-up. The second probability survey, known as the June Enumerative Survey, consists of land areas and identifies operations not covered by the list frame. About 10,800 multiple frame questionnaires were tabulated in nine Western States in 1975. In addition, the June Enumerative Survey, a probability area frame survey, which is conducted in the other two Western States, had completed last year. If it is desirable to approximately 1,700 survey questionnaires have the adjustment factor for the Range Fee Index to be on a probability basis, the vehicle is available to provide this type information. Questions that would be added to the mid-year survey are as follows:

All Non-irrigated Grazing or Pasture Lands.

1. Average rate for pasturing cattle on privately owned land in this area this year per head per month_____

2. Do you personally rent privately owned non-irrigated pasture on:

(a) A per head per month basis?_____

(b) A per acre basis?_____

3. If yes, how many head of cattle are you pasturing this year on the privately owned non-irrigated pasture?_____

4. How many days will you have these cattle on the rented pasture?_____

5. Total rent paid for pasturing these cattle on privately owned pasture this year_____

The cost of adding these questions to the two surveys would be $20,000.

INDEX OF PRICES PAID BY FARMERS

The Index of Prices Paid by Farmers measures the average change in prices paid for commodities and services bought by farm families.

[5] See Appendix Tables 1 and 2 for charges resulting from the 1969 Fee System and the Source of Fee Increases.

The index is made up of five major components. In terms of farm expenditures, the two most important components are the index of prices paid for commodities used in farm production and the index of prices paid for commodities used in family living. These two indexes comprise the Index of Prices Paid by Farmers for Goods and Services. The remaining three components of the Index are: (1) Interest charges per acre on mortgage indebtedness secured by farm real estate; (2) Taxes payable per acre on farm real estate; and (3) Wage rates paid to hired farm labor.

Two major indexes within the Prices Paid by Farmers Index are stratified further into 18 group indexes. The Farm Production Index is divided into 12 group indexes—feed, feeder livestock, seed, fertilizer, agricultural chemicals, fuels and energy, farm and motor supplies, autos and trucks, tractors and self-propelled machinery, other machinery, building and fencing materials, and farm services and cash rent. The Family Living Index is divided into six group indexes—food, clothing, housing, autos and auto supplies, medical and health, and education, recreation, and other.

As of June 15, 1976, the farm production component of the Index included 169 different commodity price series; the family living component 152 items—for a total of 321. Prices for 25 items are used in both family living and production indexes leaving a net of 296 separate price series. In the Family Living Index the medical and health and education, recreation, and other indexes are based on Consumer Price Indexes from the Bureau of Labor Statistics, and are excluded from the commodity price series count.

Price data used in the computation of the various indexes are collected largely by mail from independent and chain stores serving rural areas. Separate commodity price estimates are made for independent and for chain stores as of the 15th of the quarterly month. These separate price estimates are weighted together to obtain averages of prices paid by farmers for most family living and farm production items. In other months, prices are estimated only for chain stores which provide the basis for current index computations for the interquarterly months.

The U.S. commodity prices are computed by weighting State estimates of average prices by the estimated quantities of products purchased by farmers in each State. U.S. average prices are then combined into the group indexes, using as weights the estimated quantities of the individual commodities purchased by farmers based on a 1971–73 surveys of farmers' expenditures. Official data of the Agricultural Research Service and the Agricultural Marketing Service are also used to supplement the survey indications.

Group indexes are combined into their respective family living and production indexes, using percentage weights representing the estimated proportion of expenditures of farmers for each commodity group. These also were derived primarily from the 1971–73 Expenditure Surveys. The family living and production indexes are in turn combined into the all-commodity index of prices paid, using weights representing the proportionate expenditures for these two segments. In like manner, all commodities, interest, tax, and wage rate components are weighted, on the basis of relative expenditures, for the Index Prices Paid by Farmers.

Data Refinement

If certain components of the index of prices paid were needed to comprise a new index to reflect cost of production of cattle producers in the United States, the Statistical Reporting Service could provide such an index. Possible components to use in indicating cost of cattle production from the Index of Prices Paid are motor supplies, motor vehicles, farm machinery, farm supplies, building and fencing materials, interest per acre and wage rates. Weights could be derived from the 1975 Meat Animals Cost of Production Survey conducted by SRS for the Economic Research Service. Data from this survey are currently being summarized by ERS and should be available for analysis by January 1, 1977. The new index could then be used in a combined index formula. One such formula would be to subtract the Prices Paid Index from a Beef Price Index. The resulting combined index multiplied by a base fee would result in the annual grazing fee. This, or some derivative, to determine an annual grazing fee, is possible to compute if such a formula were used.

Beef Cattle Price

Monthly, the Statistical Reporting Service publishes an all beef cattle price for all States and for the U.S. This price is comprised of a weighted average of (1) steer and heifer prices and (2) slaughter cow prices. An allowance, if necessary, is made for slaughter bulls. Data used in making these commodity estimates includes prices from market news sources, tabulated auction sales data and survey data from individual farmers.

State data are then weighted by historic beef cattle marketings, by month, for each State to establish the monthly beef cattle price for the U.S.

The Statistical Reporting Service can provide the annual average price for beef cattle and lambs for any grouping of States. Final State prices are weighted by marketing data. Groupings of 11 States and 15 States have been made available to Forest Service and BLM for many years, for administrative use only. Final annual average prices by States are published in the February issue of Agricultural Prices. The April issue contains U.S. averages.

VII. EVALUATION OF VARIOUS FEE FORMULAS

With a history of a market economy for all other products and resources used in agriculture, the obvious solution to the problem of pricing public grazing would be to open it up for competitive bidding. After all competitive bidding would extract the full fair market value of public range for the public coffers. It would allow all citizens to compete for the use of the resource, and at the same time keep our public ranges producing beef and mutton. In addition, resource use and product output would be at its marginal value product level, and the public good would almost certainly be served by the resultant competitive conditions.

However, a competitive bidding system would presume a relatively free and competitive market, a condition that does not exist for many users and potential users of public grazing on BLM and National Forests lands. Institutional goals, tenure arrangements, legislative requirements and management restrictions of the National Forest System and Taylor Grazing District effectively eliminate a competitive environment. The location of grazing allotments, property boundaries, terrain, and water development further reduce the competitive environment. It has been estimated that as much as twenty percent of BLM land is "captive in that it would be difficult if not impossible for any other livestock operator to use certain public land tracts. Other lands are grazed in common by a number of livestock operators and should not be broken up into separate allotments.

Thus, the competitive bidding system appears infeasible as the necessary conditions for an operational system does not exist, less efficient administered pricing schemes must be considered. In each of these pricing methods the objective is to stimulate the competitive bid by employing "proxi" variables derived from the competitive environment of the livestock industry.

It is the task of this Technical Committee to attempt to recommend the proper "proxi" for the competitive bid. Attention will be directed to the Index of Private Land Lease Rates and the Combined Index (BPI–PPI). The committee will also comment on the two tier fee system proposed in S. 3071.

Index of private land leased rates

This method may be best described as the comparative market approach. It is based on the premise that an individual will not pay more for the use of a resource than his next best alternative, or conversely, the owner of a resource should receive a value equivalent to that which could be realized from the next best alternative use of that resource. Using this premise the public grazing fee should equal the private grazing rate, less the difference in the cost of using public range over private range. In the grazing fee formula, the absolute level is ignored and only the rate of change over time is used to update the base fee of $1.23 for 1966.

The use of the comparative market approach has considerable merit. First, its value is derived from the competitive environment. Second, it theoretically measures changes in efficiency of range resource use over time. Third, it should give a close estimation of the fair market value that would be obtained under a competitive bidding system. Thus, it would also fulfill the criteria of the "ideal" pricing system. Fourth, it reflects changes in the level of economic parameters such as the inflation rate, purchasing power of the dollar, and the value of farm real estate.

Critics of the Index of Private Land Lease Rate point out that land prices and net rents have a strong functional relationship. They argue that land prices on a per acre basis have increased six fold during the last 30 years, while net farm income per acre has shown no distinct trend during the same period. This behavior is hypothesised to be related to pressure for farm and ranch enlargement. Because land is a limiting resource an increasing portion of net farm income is being capitalized into the land resource. Active farmers and ranchers attribute near zero value to their labor, management, and some of their invested capital in order to pay for land, thus violating the equimartinal principal for resource valuation.

Another argument against the Index of Private Land Lease Rates is directed at the accuracy of the data. It is argued that the data represents non-livestock uses. Others point out that typical leases in the private sector are not negotiated on a head month basis, and that those responding to the survey question are not making proper transition from the actual existing lease to the head month lease basis.

The position of the Technical Committee is that the Index of Private Land Rates is a good indicator of long term adjustments taking place in western range livestock industry. It duplicates economic adjustments in the competitive sector, and is the only alternative suggested or discussed that incorporates measures of technical efficiency. Improvements made in the data collection process and discussed in the previous section should eliminate concern about the relevancy and accuracy of the data. However, the Technical Committee is concerned about the ability of the Index to reflect short-run instabilities that result during periods of disequilibrium. In the past the Index has failed to account for short-run adjustments in resource valuation.

Combined Index

This formula consists of the Index of Beef Prices and the Prices Paid Index. The formula was suggested by the American National Cattlemens Association (ANCA) and is usually referred to as the parity formula or the "ability to pay" formula. Several slightly differing versions have been offered but the Combined Index has been the nucleus of all of the proposals.

The goal of parity in the past was generally ridiculed by economists as not meaningful. But parity as defined in terms of equal resource returns should be close to their hearts after all the concept of "equal resource returns" is a primary condition defining the most efficient allocation of resources in the competitive market. When all factors are employed so that marginal returns to resources are equated within the industry and between agriculture and the nonfarm economy, maximum output of goods and services are obtained.

A second source of support for the combined index is related to economic stability. Returns to resources in the long-run have demonstrated an efficient agriculture and in particular beef cattle. However the cattle industry has shown a considerable degree of instability in the short-run return to resources. The instability results in windfall gains and losses to both the government and the ranchers alike.

Critics of the combined index insist that the formula is not directly measured in the competitive market, and consequently contains no measures of long run efficiency in resource use. It is based on the premise of constant purchasing power or constant relative income and does not allow for resource adjustment. A second part of the above argument is the cost of alternative or substitute inputs are not considered and thus it is not a fair proxi for the competitive market.

The formula has also been criticized for containing elements in the indices which are not used in western range livestock production (e.g. seed, fertilizer, and etc.). It was pointed out in the pervious section on Data Sources that these elements could be deleted from the prices paid index and proper weights be reassigned from the cost of production study currently in progress by the Economic Research Service and the Statistical Reporting Service.

The third major criticism relates to the fact that the index does not respond to the inflation rate or the value of the purchasing power of the dollar. If the combined index were used as the only method of adjusting grazing fees, the public would receive a declining real rent in the long-run. In effect the rent that the rancher paid for the use of the resource would only be at "fair market value" in the base period.

The Technical Committee noted the shortcomings as well as the advantages of the combined index. The index was recognized as a poor indicator of long-run adjustments because of the behavioral nature of indices measuring differing sectors of the supply-demand model simultaneuosly. For this reason the committee rejected the use of the combined index as the sole adjustment factor in any grazing fee formula. However, the committee also recognized the inability of the index of private land lease rates to measure short-run instabilities particularly in an environment where the value of value of the resource (public graing) is a derived demand from the product it produces (beef and lamb). Therefore the committee concluded that the range fee formula should include factors that measure changes in the value of the range resource in both the long-run and the short-run.

The two tier system, S. 3071

A procedure requiring the establishment of two levels of grazing fees based on the number of acres required for one animal unit month has been proposed by the Public Land Council and was outlined in S. 3071.

The variable fee hypothesis suggests that the value of native rangelands for livestock grazing is directly related to only one element of the lands, the density of desirable vegetation. If rangelands had no other characteristics and ranching operations were all the same, this hypothesis might be a reasonable assumption. However, these Federal rangelands have many features and conditions, some constant and some changeable, that affect their economic value to the individual stockman. Forage quantity, as a component of grazing value, varies in terms of quality from place to place and from season to season. These variations do not directly change the relative dollar value of the grazing since availability and cost of alternative feed sources for each individual rancher also impact on the economic value of the native forage to the livestock producer.

As an example of conditions that do not support the variable fee argument consider: (1) Grazing capacity allowance for livestock may be reduced to accommodate wildlife and wild horse habitat needs and therefore would not relate directly to forage quality or land productivity. (2) Intraallotment differences in forage production and grazing conditions are just as variable as interallotment differences. (3) Livestock water may be the limiting factor on some rangelands and not forage quantity and (4) Winter ranges (usually of low productivity) may have greater economic value to the stockman than summer ranges (usually of higher productivity) because the alternative is to feed expensive bay.

In setting up the 1966 Western Wide Grazing Fee Study, there was then as now a strong belief by some that a * * * of one or more of the qualitative variables such as grazing capacity, season of use, geographic area, or vegetative type. One of the conclusions of the study was that there was no basis for recommending differential base fees among ranching areas.[6] An independent analysis by the BLM during 1967 identified that there are larger user-cost differences between ranchers within any categorical grouping than between the groups.[7] In essence, there there was no statistical evidence in the study to support a variable fee. The Arthur D. Little Company, Inc., made an independent statistical analysis of the BLM and private grazing survey data. The results of this independent analysis supported the previous findings.[8]

The suggestion that an inequity is created when the same grazing fee is charged for grazing on high productivity land as for low productivity land is misleading because the unit of measurement for public land grazing is an animal unit month and not an acre of land. Also, there is no analysis availabe that the committee is aware of to support using 11 acres per AUM as the proper economic value point for dividing rangeland values for livestock grazing. The definition appears to be arbitrary and without foundation for establishing fees on public lands.

Under existing law and Executive policy a variable fee system is permitted but is not required unless specific inequities can be documented. Most of the questions and issues regarding grazing fees are related to managerial judgments and general economic factors more fundamental than public land user charges. Basically, the AUM and hence its general market value are the same from area to area since the grazing requirements of the animals are met and the yearly production cycle of the ranches are maintained. To recognize and differentiate public land grazing fees on the basis of detailed individual differences would require individual negotiation of fees with each of the 25,000 individuals using public lands.

VIII. Recommendations

Establishing a grazing fee formula which is completely acceptable to the various management agencies and the users of Public Lands is a difficult task. It must accurately reflect the value of the resource and still take into account institutional restrictions and goals. Given the inability of economics as a discipline to aggregate individual utilities onto a single function, the next best alternative appears to be a "proxi" for the norm of economic efficiency. In the absence of a better criteria this value judgment will have to be acceptable.

Because a competitive environment does not exist, and can not exist given the current institutional constraints and goals, the members of the Technical Committee recommend the following formula as a proxi for the competitive market bid for grazing on an AUM basis;

FMV = Fair Market Value for public grazing.

A = $1.23 base established from 1966 survey.

P = Combined Index (BPI–PPI).

*The data for construction of this index should come from the probability based combined list frame samples described in Section V.

BPI is a weighted index of average annual beef cattle prices less calves in the 11 Western States. PPI is an index of prices paid for inputs and would include only the seven items listed in Section V, and weighted by the Cost of Production Survey.

This formula is recommended as it provides for a consistent and efficient method of pricing the public grazing resources. The formula will reflect long-run trends in grazing values while at the same time accounting for short-run instabilities in either livestock prices or input prices. The committee has further recommended an improvement in the data collection procedures on the private land lease rates. Some modification was also suggested for the prices paid index to make it more accurately reflect western range livestock operation.

The Technical Committee has recommended the above grazing fee formula on its logical consistency. The data recommended for construction of the indices are not available for testing at this time. However it was assumed that the values for private land lease rates to be collected using the recommended improvements would be identical to the current data methods because the values will come from the same universe. Therefore the value of $3.65 from the base period of 1964–68 would continue to be the proper base for the index of private land lease rates.

It is further recommended that the mechanics of the formula be developed in detail by a work group staffed by members of the Forest Service and the Bureau of Land Management. The committee believes an upper limit of 25 percent could be imposed in the event of changes in economic conditions that would force a sudden increase in grazing fees. Other mechanics are at the discretion of the management agencies.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 63 AND SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 64—SUBMISSION OF CONCURRENT RESOLUTIONS APPROVING AMENDMENTS TO THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CHARTER

Mr. EAGLETON submitted the following concurrent resolutions, which were referred to the Committee on Governmental Affairs:

S. CON. RES. 63

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress approves the action of the District of Columbia Council described as follows:

Amendment No. 1. (relating to initiative and referendum) to the District of Columbia charter, as stated in section 2 of the Initiative, Referendum, and Recall Charter Amendments Act of 1977, approved June 14, 1977 (Act 2-46), and as ratified by a majority of the registered qualified electors of the District of Columbia voting in the referendum held for such ratification on November 8, 1977, such amendment having been submitted to the Congress for its approval on December 2, 1977, pursuant to section 303 of the District of Columbia Self-Government and Governmental Reorganization Act.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress approves the action of the District of Columbia Council described as follows:

Amendment No. 2. (relating to recall of elected officials) to the District of Columbia charter, as stated in section 2 of the Initiative, Referendum, and Recall Charter Amendments Act of 1977, approved June 14, 1977 (Act 2-46), and as ratified by a majority of the registered qualified electors of the District of Columbia voting in the referendum held for such ratification on November 8, 1977, such amendment having been submitted to the Congress for its approval on December 2, 1977, pursuant to section 303 of the District of Columbia Self-Government and Governmental Reorganization Act.

Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, last November, the voters of the District of Columbia, by overwhelming margins, approved two amendments to the District Charter that will assure them greater access and participation in governing their own community. Under the District of Columbia Self-Government and Governmental Reorganization Act, these amendments must be approved by Congress. Consequently, I am submitting two concurrent resolutions for approval of the amendments. One amendment provides for initiative and referendum, whereby the voters themselves can pass on vital local legislation. The other establishes machinery for recall. These instruments of popular government are exercised in some 23 States across the country, and, since before the turn of the century, have been used to further reform. Local supporters view these petition rights as a strengthening of home rule. The amendments were approved unanimously by the District Council in June of last year and then were submitted to the voters in November. The vote for initiative and referendum was 27,094; for recall, 28,019.

Safeguards are built into the amendments to prevent possible abuse of orderly and effective representative government. In the case of initiative and referendum, at least 5 percent of the registered voters in five or more of the city's wards would have to sign a petition before an issue is placed on the ballot. Additionally, certain significant categories of legislation are not subject to initiative or referendum, including tax and spending legislation and emergency legislation and those areas reserved under home rule for Congress. The requirement for a recall petition is even more stringent—10 percent of the registered voters in at least five wards. These are sensible safeguards and should insure a careful and thoughtful approach in taking matters directly to voters of the District. Nonetheless, they will considerably expand community involvement and will give voters far more ability to influence matters before the District Government.

Initiative and referendum can be overused, and they can become the devices of slick, well-financed campaigns, but in the hands of an alert and concerned citizenry, they are the ultimate instruments of democratic authority.

I believe Congress has little to decide in this matter. The voters want this expanded power. They made this clear at the polls. They want expanded participation in local government, and I believe Congress has no grounds but to give it to them. I urge approval of these concurrent resolutions.

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED FOR PRINTING

MULTIPURPOSE SERVICE CENTERS FOR DISPLACED HOMEMAKERS—S. 418

AMENDMENT NO. 1678

(Ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Human Resources.)

Mr. BAYH (for himself, Mr. ABOUREZK, Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. BENTSEN, Mr. BIDEN, Mr. CHURCH, Mr. CLARK, Mr. HATHAWAY, Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. PERCY, Mr. PELL, Mr. RIBICOFF, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. STONE, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. HART, Mr. CASE, and Mr. MATHIAS) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to the bill (S. 418) to provide for the establishment of multipurpose service centers for displaced homemakers, and for other purposes.

Mr. BAYH. Mr. President, today on behalf of myself and 19 cosponsors, including Senators ABOUREZK, ANDERSON, BENTSEN, BIDEN, CHURCH, CLARK, HATHAWAY, MARK O. HATFIELD, INOUYE, LEAHY, PERCY, PELL, RIBICOFF, SARBANES, STONE, KENNEDY, HART, CASE, and MATHIAS I am introducing a revised version of S. 418, the Displaced Homemakers Act, introduced originally on January 24, 1977. The revised legislation we are introducing today is identical to H.R. 10270, introduced in the House of Representatives by Congresswoman YVONNE BURKE and 110 cosponsors. The revised legislation attempts to integrate a job training and placement program for older women into already existing Federal programs under the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act, while at the same time, retaining those features of the original legislation which were designed to address the specific needs of this category of disadvantaged workers.

I. NEED FOR THE LEGISLATION

During the last 15 years, we have made great strides toward eliminating discrimination against women in employment. We have enacted the Equal Pay Act of 1963, title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, and title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972. These legislative barriers against discrimination along with an increased societal awareness of the importance of the labor force participation of women have contributed to a significant increase in the number of women in the civilian work force over the last decade. In fact, during this period women accounted for nearly three-fifths of the total increase in the civil labor force. The Department of Labor now predicts that 9 out of every 10 young women will work at some time in their life.

With these employment advances for women, what have we done to assure the financial security of those 15 million married women who have chosen to be full-time homemakers? The answer is not nearly enough. To begin with, we have never adequately recognized the value of the homemaker's contribution to our Nation's economy. We have neglected the homemaker's contribution despite the fact that as early as 1918, the National Bureau of Economic Research estimated the value of the homemaker's work as one-fourth of the gross national product.

For the homemaker, who has spent a substantial number of years providing unpaid services to family members, we have provided little, if any, assistance to become a productive member of the labor force when faced with sudden financial insecurity due to the death of her spouse, divorce, or loss of traditional family income. These women, who are not in the labor force and are over the age of 40, are designated "displaced homemakers." It is difficult to estimate the number of women who would qualify as "displaced homemakers" since Government statistics are not collected on homemakers as such. However, we can see the scope of the problem faced by displaced homemakers by looking at some selected statistics; for example:

Thirty-five percent of all female heads of households were widowed in 1975;

Over the past decade, single parent families headed by women have grown 10 times as fast as two-parent families;

The highest rate of labor force participation by women family heads was among those 45 to 54 years of age where nearly 7 out of every 10 worked;

In 1975, there were 10,104,000 widows and 3,978,000 divorced women; a 45 percent increase in widows since 1950 and 223 percent increase in divorcees since 1950.

What happened to these displaced homemakers once they lost their traditional source of income? Many of these women try to reenter the work force without marketable job skills or training. Unable to secure employment on their own, some of these women turn to the Federal Government for assistance. Sadly, the eligibility criteria for most Federal programs do not cover displaced homemakers.

For example, take Mrs. Hill, a 53-year-old widow who has just lost her husband. After paying all the funeral expenses and the hospital bills for his illness, she started looking at her financial situation. Mrs. Hill called the social security office to find out approximately how much she would receive in widow's benefits. Since Mrs. Hill was not disabled, the social security office said that she would not be eligible for anything until she reached the age of 60. Mrs. Hill also inquired about the new supplemental security income program but those benefits are only available to individuals who are blind, disabled, or over 65. So before the age of 60 social security offers no coverage for an able-bodied widow.

Mrs. Hill was out of work and had lost her job as a homemaker. She was ineligible for unemployment insurance benefits because homemakers are not paid. Her other options were paid employment or welfare. Having been out of the labor force for over 30 years, Mrs. Hill experienced the following barriers: no recent work experience, age and sex discrimination which is still a reality in employment practices. She also went to the welfare office to see if she would be eligible for any assistance and found that she would be eligible for around $115 a month and food stamps, if she met the requirements. To meet those requirements she would have had to sell her home and move into a house or apartment or public housing with a maximum housing payment of $96. Mrs. Hill really did not want to move from her home and she did not want to have to take welfare assistance. She wanted to be a productive member of society.

Or what happens to a woman like Mrs. Adams, who has not worked since her marriage to Mr. Adams 19 years ago, when her marriage ends in divorce? She begins to look at existing programs to see if there is any assistance available. Going first to social security she finds that her marriage had to have lasted 20 years in order for her to be eligible for benefits on her former husband's earnings record. Had Mr. Adams been a Government employee, she would not have had a right to pension benefits no matter how long their marriage had lasted. Assuming Mr. Adams would have had the opportunity to take out an individual retirement account for Mrs. Adams, she would have had to have been 59½ years old in order to receive her retirement account payments. Mrs. Adams was awarded alimony by the court; however, she was unable to collect it regularly.

Mrs. Adams is not unique, according to a recent poll of 1,522 women conducted by the National Commission on the Observance of International Women's Year, about 86 percent of divorced women are not awarded alimony. Of the 14 percent who are, less than one-half of them collect it regularly. One might suggest that the Congress should enact legislation to increase the enforcement of court-awarded alimony and child support payments. However, from the results of this poll that 86 percent of divorced women are not awarded alimony, such a proposal would not assist the large majority of divorced women.

In the case of divorced mothers, the Commission poll reported that 44 percent were awarded child support by the courts. Again, less than half of all divorced mothers were regularly collecting these child support payments and these payments would end when the minor child reach the age of 18.

Unfortunately, cases such as Mrs. Hill and Mrs. Adams are not unique. At the present, there is no adequate help for these women on the part of the Federal Government. It is for this reason that I introduced S. 418, legislation which would provide multipurpose centers which would provide job counseling and placement services, job training, counseling in legal problems and financial management, and outreach information services to acquaint these women with existing assistance programs.

In the absence of this much-needed Federal legislation, several States have enacted State bills providing for pilot multipurpose centers for displaced homemakers. These States include: California, Colorado, Florida, Illinois, Louisiana, Maryland, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Montana, Nebraska, New York, Oregon, and Texas.

To reemphasize the need to move on a national level to address the problems of the displaced homemaker, I want to briefly summarize some harmful myths about the needs of our Nation's homemakers.

First. Myth: All widows are financially protected at the death of their husbands by social security.

Fact: To be eligible for social security, a widow must be 60 years of age.

Second. Myth: Divorced women receive alimony.

Fact: According to a recent poll of 1,522 women conducted by the IWY Commission, 86 percent of divorced women are not awarded alimony, and of the 14 percent who are, only half collect regularly.

Third. Myth: Divorced mothers collect child support payments.

Fact: According to the IWY Commission poll only 44 percent of divorced mothers are awarded child support, with less than half collecting regularly.

Fourth. Myth: It is not difficult for any woman who wants to work to find a job.

Fact: For displaced homemakers who have not been in the labor force for several years, they face not only sex and probably age discrimination, but they have no recent work experience.

Fifth. Myth: The new individual retirement accounts will provide financial security for the nonworking spouse.

Fact: A divorced homemaker who has an IRA account must be 59½ years of age to be eligible to receive her retirement payments.

II. SUMMARY OF LEGISLATION

The revised legislation we are introducing today places the responsibility for job training and placement services for displaced homemakers under the auspices of the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act. We are hopeful that both the House Employment Opportunities Subcommittee and the Senate Subcommittee on Employment, Poverty, and Migratory Labor will make our legislation a part of the reauthorization of CETA when both subcommittees consider this legislation this spring.

Our revised legislation retains the basic provisions of the original version of S. 418 in that it provides for the establishment of a minimum of 50 displaced homemakers centers which will provide job counseling, training, and placement services for work in both the private and public sectors. These centers would also provide referrals for existing services in health, legal assistance, education, and financial management. In this manner, our legislation will not be duplicating existing services, but will continue to provide the concept of centers to more adequately serve these disadvantaged older women.

Many of us are aware that in the past CETA has not been particularly responsive to the needs of older workers. Research has indicated that although CETA served some 1.5 million persons in 1975, only 3 percent of those workers were age 55 or older. Displaced homemakers have been neglected even further under CETA in the past. Since displaced homemakers have never worked outside the home, and since many of these women, until the loss of traditional financial security, have never had to rely on Federal assistance, they have not been perceived as a group in need of financial assistance.

Because CETA programs in the past have not been attuned to the needs of the older worker in general and the displaced homemaker in particular, our revised legislation places displaced homemakers under title III of CETA, which serves designated groups in need of special assistance. Funding would be available under title III to nonprofit and community based organizations which have to date been the most responsive to the needs of older women.

Statistical evidence indicated clearly that women are entering the labor force in increasing numbers for basic economic reasons. Older women, whether to support their children or themselves, are often ill prepared to enter the job market. If they do breach the barriers of age and sex discrimination they are still likely to be employed at menial, low-level occupations which provide only marginal income. This cycle can be broken only by supplementing their inadequacies of earlier education and training with counseling and training programs designed to provide better paying job opportunities. It is this need which would be addressed by the Displaced Homemakers Act.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this legislation be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMENDMENT NO. 1678

On page 1, line 3, strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following: That this Act may be cited as the "Displaced Homemaker Assistance Act".

DISPLACED HOMEMAKERS ACT

Mr. HATHAWAY. Mr. President, it is my pleasure to join with my colleagues in introducing the Displaced Homemakers Assistance Act. This legislation amends the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act (CETA) of 1973 to provide assistance to displaced homemakers. For the purposes of this bill, displaced homemakers are individuals 40 years of age or older who have worked in the home, unpaid, for a substantial number of years, have difficulty in securing employment, are unemployed or underemployed, and have been dependent on the income of another family member, but are no longer supported by that income, or are about to lose that support.

Specifically, the bill provides for the establishment of 50 multipurpose service centers offering job counseling, training and placement services for employment of displaced homemakers in the public and private sectors. It also provides for counseling and referrals for existing services in health, financial management, legal assistance, and education as well as information and outreach services relating to existing programs. In addition, the bill authorizes the payment of stipends to those demonstrating financial need. Finally, the bill requires the Secretary of Labor to conduct a study of the feasibility and procedures for including displaced homemakers in Federal employment, unemployment, education, and health assistance programs.

It becomes clear that such legislation is warranted when one reviews the situation confronting the displaced homemaker. This individual is typically a woman over 40, suddenly without financial support due either to death of a spouse or divorce. She either left the paid work force years ago, or never entered it, and has spent the intervening years raising her family. She has no job security, no retirement, no health insurance, no unemployment. Of greater impact, however, is that she often feels unable to cope, without any traditional marketable skills. The job market is often quick to confirm these feelings. She may find herself the subject of discrimination in the job market because of her age, sex, and lack of recent paid work experience.

These are women who have been homemakers for a significant number of years. Most have never asked for any public assistance. Many have filed joint income tax returns for years with their husbands and have, through their in-kind contributions to their families, worked to benefit all of society. With some initial assistance, these women become self-supporting, thus preventing any further trauma to themselves and to their families. Without assistance, a woman who is suddenly widowed or divorced, or who suffers some other loss of family income, is in a poor position to care for herself or others.

While she may feel unable to cope, this person is not without job skills. The homemaker develops a range of useful and potentially marketable skills which may be upgraded or supplemented by these programs to place her in a position to support herself and others. This bill will provide women with the choice of staying home to raise their children without the fear of being permanently shut out of the job market.

These people presently fall between the cracks of existing Federal income security programs as well as State aid. They are generally too young for social security, and may never be eligible if divorced from a family wage earner short of 20 years of marriage, 10 after December 1978. They are ineligible for aid to families with dependent children if all their children are over 18 and they are not disabled. They cannot receive unemployment because they have been engaged in unpaid labor within the home and cannot get a job because of "lack of experience."

This need has been recognized and addressed on the grassroots level. Over 14 States, including Maine, have adopted displaced homemakers legislation. Representative Merle Nelson of the Maine State Legislature successfully sponsored such legislation into law. The State of Maine has recognized the needs of displaced homemakers and the validity of programs targeted to deal with their specific needs. While the issue is already being addressed in various States, resources there are limited, and Federal aid is warranted.

The individuals who would benefit from this legislation are people who have been productive members of society. They have cared for their families, raised their children, worked without pay and often without recognition in their communities. This bill provides the opportunity, with minimal Federal assistance, for people to enter or return to the work force, to continue to contribute to society, to be independent and self-supporting. I look forward to supporting this legislation when it is considered by the Committee on Human Resources, on which I serve.

HEALTH WARNING ON ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES—S. 1464

AMENDMENT NO. 1679

(Ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Human Resources.)

Mr. THURMOND submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1464) to require a health warning on the labels of bottles containing certain alcoholic beverages.

NOTICES OF HEARINGS

SELECT COMMITTEE ON SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I wish to announce that the Select Committee on Small Business Subcommittee on Economic Development, Marketing, and the Family Farmer and the Senate Agriculture Subcommittee on Agricultural Credit and Rural Electrification will hold hearings to investigate recent difficulties that developed surrounding the delivery of Small Business Administration physical disaster loans for crop loss due to drought. The hearings will be held on January 30, 31, and February 1. They will begin at 10 a.m., in room 424 of the Russell Senate Office Building. The Senator from Georgia (Mr. NUNN) and the Senator from Alabama (Mr. ALLEN) will cochair the hearings.

Further information can be obtained from the committee office, room 424, Russell Senate Office Building, telephone 224–5175.

HEARINGS ON CAPITAL FORMATION PROBLEMS OF SMALL AND MEDIUM-SIZED INDEPENDENT ENTERPRISES

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I wish to announce hearings to be held by the Select Committee on Small Business on capital formation problems of small and medium-sized independent enterprises on February 8 and 10, 1978. These hearings will take place in the committee hearing room, 424 Russell Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C. 20510, beginning at 10 a.m. each day. All who are interested in these matters or who wish to testify may obtain further information from the committee offices (202) 224–5175.

The background for these hearings is contained in reports which were placed before the Senate on September 27, 1977 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 31199) and changes to December 15, 1977 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 39592).

They indicate that for even the most promising existing small firms in this country, it has become virtually impossible to obtain capital. For the 3 years 1974–76, only 41 U.S. companies with less than $5 million in net worth were able to sell stock in public securities markets.

The hearings are intended to explore the many facets of small business capital formation. The first phase of the hearings will attempt to carefully delineate the basic problems of attracting capital to smaller firms, including the amounts of capital which are needed at various points of the life cycle of new and small businesses in various industries.

Witness lists for these hearings will be released as soon as they are completed.

SUBCOMMITTEE OF CITIZENS AND SHAREHOLDERS RIGHTS AND REMEDIES

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, the Subcommittee on Citizens and Shareholders Rights and Remedies of the Committee on the Judiciary will hold a hearing on Monday, February 6, 1978, on S. 476, S. 477, S. 478, S. 1256, S. 1257, and H.R. 7819, pertaining to diplomatic immunity. The hearings will commence at 9 a.m., in room 2228, Dirksen Senate Office Building.

Anyone wishing to submit testimony for the record, contact Mr. Herman Schwartz, chief counsel, or Mr. Keith O'Donnell, counsel of the subcommittee, 4–B Russell Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C. 20510. Phone 202–224–4703.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON INTELLIGENCE

Mr. BAYH. Mr. President, I wish to announce hearings before the Select Committee on Intelligence on S. 1566, the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1977, often referred to as the wiretap bill. Two panels of witnesses are scheduled to testify. The first panel includes Messrs. John Shattuck and Jerry Berman of the American Civil Liberties Union and Mr. Morton Halpern of the Center for National Security Studies. The second includes Dr. Christopher Pyle of Mount Holyoke College, privacy expert Mr. David Watters, and Mr. Steven Rosenfeld of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York. The hearings will be held on Wednesday, February 8, 1978, in 6226 Dirksen Senate Office Building.

COMMITTEE ON THE BUDGET

Mr. MUSKIE. Mr. President, the Senate Budget Committee will hold public hearings beginning on February 1 and running through March 17 in preparation for the first budget resolution for fiscal year 1979. The specific dates of the hearings are February 1, 2, 3, 8, 9, 21, 28, March 1, 2, 8, 9, 10, 15, 16, 17, and 20.

These hearings will form the basis for the committee's decisions with respect to the first budget resolution for fiscal year 1979. For the first time, the committee also plans to examine the 5-year implications of these decisions and will report back to the Congress on its findings.

The committee hearings will include panels of outside experts to closely examine the national priorities for Federal spending. The witnesses come from diverse backgrounds and their analyses should be helpful to the committee and to the Congress in analyzing the President's budget.

Hearings with administration witnesses will provide the committee the opportunity to evaluate the President's short- and long-run economic forecasts, to review the CBO analysis of the fiscal and economic objectives of the Carter budget, and to conduct a far-ranging examination of the spending programs proposed for fiscal year 1979.

On Wednesday, February 1, the committee will look at the short- and long-range economic forecasts as well as various policy options for sustaining the economic recovery. Our witnesses will be Dr. Charles Schultze, Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, and Dr. Alice M. Rivlin, Director of the Congressional Budget Office.

On Thursday, February 2, the Secretary of the Treasury, W. Michael Blumenthal, will discuss the President's tax cut and tax reform package, as well as the international financial situation.

On Friday, February 3, James McIntvre, the Acting Director of OMB, will highlight the major spending programs in the President's budget and detail the significant changes and developments in this first Carter budget.

The following week we will hear from public witnesses on national priorities and the fiscal crisis in State and local governments. On Wednesday, February 8, we will explore the fiscal dilemma of the cities and States with Gov. Brendan Byrne of New Jersey, Gov. James Thomson of Illinois, and Mayor Kevin White of Boston. On Thursday, February 9, we will examine the questions of national priorities. Our witnesses will include Douglas Fraser, the president of the United Auto Workers Union, Clarence Mitchell, the Washington director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, and Rudolph Penner, program director of the American Enterprise Institute and former chief economist of OMB.

After the Lincoln Day recess, we will turn to the question of controlling inflation, a subject of critical importance to all Americans. On February 21, our witnesses will include Dr. Barry Bosworth, Director of the Council on Wage and Price Stability, Dr. Arthur Okun, senior fellow of the Brookings Institution, and Mr. Albert T. Sommers, senior vice president and chief economist of the Conference Board.

Starting on February 28, we will begin a week of hearings on the energy and the defense budgets. On February 28 our witnesses will include James Schlesinger, the Secretary of the Department of Energy and Paul MacAvoy of the Yale School of Organization and Management and former member of the Council of Economic Advisers.

On March 1, a panel of outside experts will analyze the President's defense proposals. The witnesses will include Townsend Hoopes, former Under Secretary of the Air Force, Herbert Scoville, former Deputy Director of the Central Intelligence Agency, and Eugene Restow, former Under Secretary of State.

On March 2, Secretary of Defense, Harold Brown, will present the administration's defense budget.

On March 8 and 9 we will look at the welfare reform, health and education programs in the 1979 budget. On March 8, our panel of experts will include Dr. John Knowles, president of the Rockefeller Foundation, Dr. Eli Ginsberg, chairman of the Committee on Manpower Policy, Dr. Frank Armbruster, of the Hudson Institute, and Dr. James Storey of the Urban Institute.

On March 10 we will discuss the administration's welfare, health, and jobs program with Secretary of HEW Joseph Califano and Secretary of Labor Ray Marshall.

On Wednesday, March 15, we will review the question of monetary policy with G. William Miller, the Chairman-designate of the Federal Reserve Board.

On Thursday, March 16, we will turn to the question of the administration's proposals for urban development. Witnesses will include a representative from the Conference of Mayors, Prof. George Steinlieber of Rutgers University, and Carla Hills, the former Secretary of HUD.

On Friday, March 17, the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development, Patricia Roberts Harris, will present the administration's plan for urban development. It is especially important that the committee has this opportunity to develop sound budget numbers for any new initiatives that have not been included in the January budget.

On Monday, March 20, Representative RICHARD BOLLING, chairman of the Joint Economic Committee, will present a summary of the JEC's March 15 report to the Budget Committee.

All hearings will be held in room 6202, Dirksen Senate Office Building, beginning at 10 a.m., except the February 3 hearing which will be held in room 318, Russell Senate Office Building. For further information, please contact Karen Williams, chief counsel of the Senate Budget Committee.

JOINT HEARINGS ON HUMPHREY-HAWKINS FULL EMPLOYMENT BILL

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. PROXMIRE) and myself, I announce that a joint hearing will be held Thursday, February 2, 1978, by the Committee on Human Resources and the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs on S. 50, the Full Employment and Balanced Growth Act.

The hearing is scheduled to begin at 9:30 a.m. in room 1202 of the Dirksen Senate Office Building.

We anticipate hearing testimony from Mrs. Coretta Scott King and Murray H. Finley, cochairpersons of the Full Employment Action Council; Andrew Biemiller, legislative director of the AFL–CIO; and Irving Bluestone, vice president of the United Auto Workers.

Mr. President, I should like to speak briefly about this hearing and the legislative process that it will initiate.

This joint hearing by the two Senate committees to which this important legislation has been referred will begin a process of committee consideration that will culminate, under Senate rules, with a joint report to the Senate on the bill.

I have every confidence that full employment legislation can be enacted by Congress this year.

The focus of the joint hearing will be the revised version of the Full Employment and Balanced Growth Act of 1977 that was worked out with the White House by our late, beloved colleague, Senator Hubert Humphrey, and his collaborating author, Congressman AUGUSTUS HAWKINS of California.

This is the version of the bill that was endorsed by President Carter in respect to those provisions that do not deal with congressional procedures to be established under the act. As you know, Mr. President, these procedures relate to congressional consideration and adoption of an annual full employment and balanced growth program.

As I indicated, the joint hearing Thursday will initiate formal consideration in the Senate of the revised S. 50.

Within the Committee on Human Resources, the hearings will continue on Friday under the leadership of Senator GAYLORD NELSON, chairman of our Subcommittee on Employment, Poverty, and Migratory Labor. Subsequent hearings by the subcommittee, and by the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs, will be announced at the appropriate time.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

AMERICAN FARMER

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. President, in recent days we have witnessed a genuine grassroots political movement in action. America's farmers have come to Washington to protest their serious economic condition. Because of their presence, the entire Congress has become more aware and more sensitive to their plight. The American agriculture movement has succeeded in focusing the attention of the entire Nation on the food-producing sector of our economy. Members of the movement should take great pride in their initial achievements.

The Kansas farmers who have visited my office have made it clear that they are no longer able or willing to accept the prevailing economic conditions on the farm. They want their fair share—no more, no less. And I think it is our responsibility to help them. We simply must find a way to keep family farmers on the farm.

Mr. President, I think the events of the last several days have been instructive to all concerned. I think many farmers through being here have come to understand something that is a constant frustration to all of us: the legislative process is complicated and arduous. And it is extremely time consuming. In the same way, Mr. President, we in Congress have come to realize that the farm problem is not imaginary. It is real and it threatens the well-being of our entire economy. It is no understatement to say that, unless current trends are reversed, the family farm is in grave danger.

Our Nation's farmers are feeling the unbearable pressure of huge debts and small returns for their products. And, while prices have been pushed lower, the increase in production costs has continued unabated. In only 4 years, fertilizer prices increased 75 percent, building and fencing materials 73 percent, and tractors and other farm machines 75 percent. Also, the cost of energy has continued to climb.

Mr. President, farm income has dropped every year since 1974. While farm income has been declining, farm indebtedness has been rising dramatically. In 1974, the total farm debt, including Commodity Credit Corporation loans, was $32.8 million. Preliminary figures for this year indicate that total farm debt exceeds $54 million, representing an increase of 65 percent.

But while farmers have been caught up in the price-cost crisis they have been producing more than at any time in our history. That is what is so unfair about this situation. As the farmer has contributed more to the national health, he has received less and less in return.

Mr. President, it is clear that American agriculture is in trouble. It is likely that a number of family farmers will be forced out of business this year. If economic conditions do not improve it is clear that banks will have to foreclose on a much larger number of family farms next year and the year after. Such an eventuality is clearly against the national interest and cannot be tolerated.

Last year the Congress devoted a great deal of time to studying farm conditions and developing a long range farm program. The bill which Congress finally approved did not contain all the provisions that many of us from farm States thought that it should. But on the whole the bill reflected an understanding of economic conditions on the farm at that time. It now appears that we may have misjudged those conditions. We were writing the bill at the time that prices were falling radically and surpluses were accumulating at a dramatic rate. The economic consequences of these trends may not have been fully anticipated.

Therefore, Mr. President, it seems imperative that the Agriculture Committees in both the Senate and the House immediately undertake a review of present farm conditions with the view of determining how the farm program should be altered to take account of these changed circumstances. Leaders of the American Agriculture Movement are arguing not only that the present program is wholly inadequate but that we should dramatically change the course of our price support policies. This proposal should be given serious consideration. It should not be dismissed out of hand. But it is also clear that the economic and political consequences of such a shift in policy are so enormous that we cannot move in that direction except after considerable analysis and debate.

In addition to urging the Agriculture Committees to reopen consideration of revising the Food and Agriculture Act of 1977, I would also urge the administration to reevaluate its own position. Secretary Bergland has been adamant in stating that the present farm program is adequate to meet present conditions and will provide the economic relief that is necessary. I think there is growing evidence to the contrary.

Last year I offered an amendment to the farm bill restating the traditional commitment by the Congress to maintaining the family farm system in this country. That amendment also required that the Secretary of Agriculture is to report to the Congress not later than July first of each year as to the condition of the family farm system and how present farm programs are serving to promote, or failing to promote, the family farm goal.

I have today written Secretary Bergland requesting that in view of present conditions he accelerate the preparation of these reports and that the findings required by section 102(B) be forwarded to the Congress at the earliest possible date. While the reports required by this section are comprehensive in nature I think it is vitally important that the Department of Agriculture gather at the earliest possible date all data relevant to farm indebtedness. In particular we need to have a quick and accurate assessment of the numbers and types of farms that may be facing foreclosure this year.

Mr. President, beyond the question of how we should revise the farm program, it is particularly clear, it seems to me, that we have to do a better job of expanding our export sales of grain to other countries and of improving international commodity prices. There are a number of actions that can be taken in this area that I believe would be of help. Greater export sales help to strengthen domestic prices and also reduce the farm balance of payments deficit. Significant increase of exports will be of enormous benefit, not only to American farmers, but to the economy as a whole.

In the near future I intend to introduce specific legislative proposals and other recommended courses of action to further this goal of expanded grain exports.

Mr. President the American Agriculture Movement has dramatically and effectively called to the Nation's attention the serious economic plight of much of our agriculture community. Their call for economic equality and their fair share of the economic pie is understood and endorsed by a great majority of the Congress. I would be less than honest if I were to say that a majority of my colleagues and I endorse all their policy demands at this time but I am convinced that I am right in saying to the American Agriculture Movement and to the American agriculture community as a whole that the Congress will take whatever steps are necessary to preserve the family farm. On this I believe there is universal agreement. We must now work out the procedures by which this commitment is to be fulfilled.

GEORGIA SUPPORTS FARMERS

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, the Georgia State Senate recently adopted a resolution expressing their support of the American farmer and urging the U.S. Congress to take every possible action to strengthen American agriculture and improve farm income. The current farm situation is indeed a real and serious problem which affects the well-being of all Americans. It is imperative that we focus attention on the financial pressures presently confronting our farmers and take immediate action to help revitalize the faltering farm economy.

For myself and my colleague, Senator NUNN, I bring Georgia Senate Resolution 266 to the attention of my colleagues in the Senate, and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION

Recognizing the plight of the American farmer and urging the United States Congress to take whatever steps are necessary and appropriate to assure economic parity for the farmer; and for other purposes

Whereas, the backbone of our free enterprise system and our American way of life is and always has been the untiring contributions of our farmers and since the founding of this great nation the farmer has been the major source of stability and strength of America; and

Whereas, the American farmers has led the world in agricultural innovation and in solving chronic food shortages which have plagued the developed and undeveloped world alike; and

Whereas, agribusiness is the largest economic activity in Georgia and the citizens of the State of Georgia are deeply and forever indebted to Georgia farmers for their contributions to the overall standard of living and way of life Georgians enjoy and take pride in; and

Whereas, while the standard of living for many segments of our nation's economy has steadily increased, the farmer has been receiving a steadily decreasing share of the national income and this has led to an overall weakening of the agribusiness morale and if this adverse trend plaguing our farmers is not reversed, it most definitely will lead to a national economic crisis and will undermine our national strength in every area; and

Whereas, after suffering through escalating production costs, declining market prices, and extremely harsh weather conditions which literally destroyed whole crops, the farmers, out of virtual desperation, have joined together throughout this great State and nation under the banner of the American Agricultural Movement to peacefully, but dramatically, focus national attention on the economic woes of the agribusiness community; and

Whereas, although the Georgia Senate realizes the Congressional Delegation of the State of Georgia understands the plight of Georgia's farmers, there are those in the Congress of the United States who don't even have a single farmer in their district.

Now, therefore, be it resolved by the Georgia Senate that this body does hereby strongly support the farmer and hereby urge the United States Congress to take whatever steps are necessary and appropriate to assure economic parity for the farmer.

Be it further resolved that all members of the Georgia Senate are individually and collectively in support of the farmer and intend to do all in their power and authority to help the farmer resolve his economic dilemma and regain his long established leadership role in virtually every facet of American life.

Be it further resolved that the Secretary of the Senate is hereby authorized and directed to transmit appropriate copies of this Resolution to each member of the Georgia Congressional Delegation.

CIA DIRECTOR DEFENDS AGENCY'S SECRECY

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, for the last year I have been privileged to serve as a member of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence. As a member of that committee, I have time and time again been made aware of the dilemmas caused in this open and free society by the secrecy required to protect vital intelligence activities.

Adm. Stansfield Turner's thoughts on secrecy deserve to be read by all those who are trying to determine the appropriate place of intelligence activities in our system of government. Our Nation is fortunate to have the service of the dedicated and capable men and women who make up our CIA under Admiral Turner's able leadership.

Mr. President, I wish to share with my colleagues an article which appeared in the Providence Journal on January 13, entitled, "CIA Director Defends Agency's Secrecy." I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CIA DIRECTOR DEFENDS AGENCY'S SECRECY

WASHINGTON.—There have been stories in the media in recent weeks concerning a new book—Decent Interval, by Frank Snepp—that is critical of the CIA's role in the closing days of Vietnam. News stories question whether the CIA had the right to review this book or, by extension, any work before publication and, if so, whether it had the right to excise portions it reasonably considered damaging to national security.

The answer to the first question is unequivocally yes. The CIA had the right to review because the author had signed a specific agreement to that effect as part of the terms of his employment with the agency. At no time prior to publication did he challenge the validity of that agreement. Rather, he claims there is some higher right that gives him the privilege of breaking that oath.

Yet, all of the evidence upon which Snepp bases that rationale was available to him when he met with me on May 17 of last year. In that meeting he explicitly promised me that he would fulfill his written obligation to provide us his manuscript for review. More than that, he reaffirmed this obligation a few days later in writing.

The CIA and I, as director, accepted this man at his word. We made no effort to monitor the progress of his activities. He simply violated both his own oath and our trust. Moreover, his publisher, Random House, and his initial TV interviewer on "60 Minutes," have also acknowledged that they were party to this deliberate evasion of written and spoken promises.

Why do people and organizations feel that duplicity is justified in circumstances like these? Because, I suspect, of an erroneous premise, clearly expressed in some of the newspaper articles on this case, that government employees inevitably place covering their and their agencies' reputations above their duties and even above the law.

This is a common anti-establishment reaction that has become so familiar in recent years. Its fallacy lies in the absence of any evidence that the CIA, over the past year and a half when Snepp was writing his book, deliberately used secrecy to protect its reputation. To the contrary, the public record attests unequivocally to the agency's willingness to face the past squarely whatever the effect on its public reputation. The self-revelations last July of the MKULTRA drug-abuse activities of the 1950s and the 1960s are only the most recent examples of this forthright policy.

What is at stake, however, is a fundamental issue for our society. If the society cannot trust the judgment of its public servants regarding what should or should not be withheld from the public, then the society can in fact have no secrets at all. The logical extension of the (Daniel) Ellsberg-Snepp syndrome is that any of our 210 million citizens is entitled to decide what should or should not be classified information.

Secrecy is, of course, dangerous. It can be abused. Yet, some things must be secret. Clearly there must be checks and balances on those who decide. But because these judgments are difficult does not mean that the chaos of no regulation at all is to be preferred. I believe that the public recognizes the necessity for some secrecy in our modern society. There is no question that we each recognize it in our individual lives. Nor is there a question that we recognize it in the extension to government. None of us is so naive as to believe that we live in a totally open and benign world.

Many of our efforts, like those directed toward strategic-arms limitations, which could move us closer to the open and peaceful world that we all desire, would be impossible if we tried to negotiate from a position of total openness. Nonetheless, how much secrecy is necessary and who should decide what will remain secret are vexing issues.

How much must always be a matter of the subjective judgment of human beings. The best we can do is build into our system, as we have in the past few years, a series of bureaucratic checks and balances that will control secrets and secret activities, yet at the same time protect the public from any abuses that excessive secrecy can encourage.

Beyond that, another check is the ballot box, where the public exercises ultimate control over the quality of individuals in public office. And, also, the free media in our society can assist the public in ensuring against excesses of secrecy. However, such vigilance does not best proceed from the unsubstantiated assumption of evil motives on the part of all public servants.

Investigative reporting does imply some measure of investigation. No one from Random House or CBS, for instance contacted me or anyone else in the CIA to investigate the other side of this story. It would appear that they feared that we might have obtained an injunction against publication. Yet, an injunction is a legal mechanism of our judicial process. It, too, is a means of protecting the public. Should corporations be encouraged to skirt the legal mechanisms of our country by subterfuge?

This case in itself is not worthy of this much discussion. It is only of interest as an example of our dwindling capacity to maintain the minimal level of secrecy essential to the effective operation of our intelligence apparatus, as well as many other organs of our government. It is remarkable today, and I say this with no self-pride because I am a newcomer, that the CIA can operate as effectively as it does despite these circumstances.

President Carter has said, "One of the greatest surprises to me in coming to office is how effective the CIA is." The concomitant of this fine performance is the fundamentally healthy and patriotic attitude within the agency despite its being a frequent whipping boy. There is no question in my mind that the people of the United States recognize the need for good intelligence and can appreciate the destructive effort the carping of a Snepp can have. It is time, instead, to concentrate on the constructive role of the oversight of the CIA and other agencies of the government.

I hope that the public will join us in the CIA in seeking constructively to understand and build our role for the future. We need less encumbrance from national self-flagellation over the past and more interest in how we can achieve a workable balance between necessary secrecy on the one hand and oversight on the other.

Perhaps that venerable statesman Averell Harriman is overly generous when he often says, "The CIA is our first line of defense." But he is not far enough off that we can afford less than a constructive approach to what the CIA should be providing for the defense of our country and its institutions.

NUCLEAR ATTACK ON WASHINGTON

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, more than 2 years of effort and 3,000 pages of testimony have gone into consideration of nuclear nonproliferation legislation soon to come before the U.S. Senate. More recently, the distinguished and able chairman of the Governmental Affairs Committee, Senator RIBICOFF, has been conducting a series of hearings on antiterrorism which have in part focused on the issue of nuclear terrorism. The nuclear nonproliferation act, S. 897, contains a number of provisions which are designed to protect against nuclear terrorism as well as the diversion of materials by a nation for the purpose of constructing nuclear weapons.

In the Outlook Section to the Washington Post on January 29, 1978, an article by Ms. Nan Randall appeared, vividly portraying the probable results of a nuclear weapon being detonated in or over the city of Washington. The horrors which are described in this article would be repeated for any American city subject to a nuclear attack, either by another nation or by terrorists.

I urge my colleagues to read this article and to give their support to prompt passage of the nuclear nonproliferation act when it comes up.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Washington Post article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IF THE UNTHINKABLE HAPPENED HERE

(By Nan Randall)

SCENARIO I: NUCLEAR TERRORISTS

Around 11 in the morning on a pleasant Tuesday, a van with cheerful, striped curtains pulls into a two-hour metered parking space at 17th Street and Pennsylvania Avenue NW as an old VW bug pulls out. The occupants of the van feed four quarters into the meter and stroll in front of the White House. They accept a couple of flyers from the usual demonstrators and continue on to 11th and G. There they disappear into the subway and head for the shuttle at National Airport.

An hour and a half later, as lunch-hour promenaders clog the sidewalks, a 15-kiloton bomb rips a gaping hole in the heart of Washington.

Fifteen kilotons do not make a large weapon by today's standards. But 15 kilotons are close to the size of the bomb that dropped on Hiroshima and killed up to 100,000 people.

The terrorist bomb gives no warning. There is no siren or emergency broadcast. Just a flash.

The fireball reaches from the middle of the White House to the edge of the World Bank building. Both the old and new Executive Office Buildings are engulfed, along with the modern office buildings that border the White House grounds. Nothing remains in this area but a crater about 500 feet across at the point of the explosion. What was there before has been sucked up into the rising fireball.

The extent of very severe damage—in which no one survives but a few people who find themselves in a sturdy government building basement—reaches from L Street on the north to Constitution Avenue on the south. The glass buildings that have sprung up along L and K Streets are swept clean, leaving perhaps only the upright framing.

Fires start simultaneously in a wide circle around the explosion. Pedestrians at Washington Circle or walking on the Mall feel their clothes burst into flame and their skin sear from the thermal, or heat, radiation. Any barrier to the rays is effective shielding, so only those who stand completely exposed suffer. Still, at distances where the blast damage is survivable, the thermal radiation is fatal to an exposed body.

Shoppers emerging from the Discount Record Store off Dupont Circle have a 50 per cent chance of surviving the direct blast effects. But even though they are three-quarters of a mile away, heavy initial nuclear radiation (beta and gamma rays) reaches them. This initial radiation occurs in the first minute after the explosion. It is very intense but doesn't spread far, so it is only of major importance in small sized nuclear explosions. In big ones, you're pulverized anyway.

The explosion compresses the air around it and pushes outward with tremendous force. The moving shock wave creates winds many times the force of a hurricane, even at some distance. At Washington Circle the winds are almost 20 miles an hour, while the pressure of the shock wave knocks out electrical lines, shatters windows and collapses partitions. The air is thick with flying objects, including people. George Washington University Hospital, instead of coordinating relief efforts, is a casualty itself.

Within five minutes after the blast, the downtown Washington streets are littered with the dead and dying, many caught under the fallen debris. Fires flare, spread and move together over the city.

Yet the most unpredictable hazard has not yet occurred.

A terrorist bomb is likely to be an extremely "dirty" fission bomb, exploded on the ground. All that material blasted out of the crater and vaporized by the fireball has risen high into the stem of the mushroom cloud. But it will come back, at one time or another.

No one has ever exploded a test bomb at ground level in a city (Nagasaki, like Hiroshima, was a mid-air burst, so there was virtually no fallout), so no one is sure how the fallout will act. But the best educated guesses give an outline of the problem:

Within 5 to 10 minutes, the earliest fallout starts to settle. Because the prevailing winds are from the west, the point of greatest danger is east of the explosion; a mile and a half away, around the Capitol, people go underground for a couple of days. Senators, congressmen and pages huddle next to the Capitol's heating system in the basement.

One of the major effects of the fallout is to hamper rescue operations for those who are injured but not dead. The center of the blast area is so hot that those very few who are not killed outright will, nevertheless, die of radiation sickness soon. Those in the damage area and in a barely survivable state may not be rescued in time while radiation monitoring equipment is located for the rescue squads. (As fallout does not follow a consistent pattern, every rescue worker has to monitor the areas he or she enters at all times.) Even if neither the injury nor the radiation dose is, by itself, sufficient to kill, the combination of the two can be.

Rescue efforts start around the edges of the blast rather than in the center, partially because there are more rescuable patients—in disasters you rescue those who have a chance to pull through and leave the borderline cases for later—and because rescue squads can only penetrate into the fallout area for a short time, if at all. Firemen, the backbone of rescue operations normally, are tied up attempting to stem the spread of the multiple fires that have sprung up—where there is enough water pressure to use the hoses after a number of water mains have burst.

The news of the spreading fallout pattern precedes the radioactivity itself in areas such as Landover Mall and other close-by suburbs in Prince George's County. In Cheverly residents must go inside rather than hunt for loved ones in the blast area.

How would the social equilibrium of the city survive? In his book, "Nuclear Disaster," Dr. Tom Stonier quotes a Japanese survivor of Hiroshima, speaking of a period two weeks after the bomb: "The ruthless and greedy were ruling the city . . . People with evil faces and foul tongues were wearing the best clothes . . . A scarcity of sentries made looting easy. During the war no one would have thought of stealing and goods would lie in open fields without even the need for a guard, but now nothing was safe that was not locked up."

It happened in New York during the blackout and in Johnstown after the flood.

Then there will be the long-term effects, the lingering—the increased number of malformed infants born to mothers who were subjected to fallout in the waiting room at Columbia Hospital's clinic, or the sudden increase in leukemia 10 years later. Genetic damage might turn up generations later.

If a 15-kiloton terrorist bomb exploded in Washington, the carnage could be worse than Hiroshima's—our buildings downtown are less resistant to shock than the Japanese buildings. Based on the peak population in the downtown area at that time of day, the killed and severely injured would number 30,000 to 70,000.

SCENARIO II: ATTACKED BY MISSILES

Our first warning of a major nuclear attack comes from 30 feet under a cow pasture. The entrance to Region 2 headquarters of the Defense Civil Preparedness Agency (DCPA) in Olney, Md., looks a little like a fast food outlet. Its modernistic lines give little indication of the computers, monitoring equipment and broadcasting facilities hidden below ground—although the cows have to contend with a strange array of antennas in their grazing area.

But in a special bunker, hardened against blast effects, the East's hookup with the North American Defense Command (NORAD) is under 24-hour alert. In the event of an attack warning, a flashing light and warbling siren warn the monitors of a message coming from NORAD in Colorado Springs. If our elaborate DEW (Distant Early Warning) Line radar in the Arctic Circle picks up menacing shadows, the commander of NORAD issues the attack warning within seconds.

Immediately, 200 sirens and more than a thousand bell and light alerts are activated by the twist of a telephone dial on the communications console. All radio stations stop in mid-broadcast and a pre-recorded message from the President takes over the airwaves.

In Washington, the city's civil defense chief, George Rodericks, picks up the NORAD warning from a little speaker on his desk and prepares to start his area-wide broadcasts of instructions. Someone pushes the little red button on the communications console in the mayor's command center and Rodericks' instructions blast out of every Muzak speaker in every waiting room, supermarket or elevator. (The system is known as EMERZAK.)

But, in essence, all Rodericks can tell us is to get to shelter, fast.

We have only 5 to 20 minutes after the first shrieking wail of the warning sirens to run for cover—the time to run for basements or to crowd into the public fallout shelters scattered around the area. The warning does not leave us time to pick up children from school or husbands and wives from work or to locate the family pet roaming the neighborhood garbage cans.

Until the warheads explode, we do not know whether Washington is a target. Crowded into our fallout shelters—there is no blast shelter in Washington, at least for ordinary folk—we have to rely on luck and hope.

(Whether Washington would in fact be a target is a matter of dispute. Some argue that the capital would not be struck, because it is not strategically important and because the attacker would want to make sure there was someone in authority left to negotiate with afterward. Others argue that Washington is the logical first-strike target, simply because of its symbolic importance—and that the President and his cabinet would be safely away and perfectly capable of negotiating. DCPA has awarded Washington the dubious honor of being counted as a Category II target—i.e., a major military complex. Category I includes all the big missile silos; no other U.S. city rates higher than Category III.)

Experts in the Pentagon make entire careers thinking up attack scenarios, but predicting what would land where is a risky business. Still, for the sake of demonstration and based on some realistic assumptions, suppose that four 1-megaton warheads landed on the White House, the Pentagon, the CIA in Langley and Andrews Air Force Base. (The selection of these targets is symbolic. Better targeting could be achieved by not bombing the White House and the Pentagon, as they are too close together. Humorists have suggested that bombing Pepco would create more havoc than going after the CIA. And we are assuming that the warheads hit their targets when, in reality, an error of 1 mile is typical of the state of Soviet missile art.)

A megaton-sized explosion (1 million tons of TNT) on a city is something no one has tested or experienced. Experts candidly admit that they can only make guesses about the devastation.

Some of today's weapons are as large as 20 megatons, which would produce a fireball one-fourth the size of the whole of the District of Columbia and would spread carnage and severe damage in a circle 16 miles in radius. But now even the Kremlin has come to recognize that a few smaller weapons are more accurate and more deadly than one large blunderbuss, so 1-megaton warheads are becoming the most common variety in the Soviet stockpile, and would be among the more likely ones to be used against Washington.

Miles away from a nuclear explosion, the flash is brighter than the sun at high noon. Close in, those who look at the blue white light are instantly blinded. The fireball, as hot as the center of the sun, vaporizes the surfaces it touches. This seething mass of heat lifts up into the air like a huge balloon, sucking tons of dirt, rock and debris behind it in a rising column. (In time, this will return to earth as radioactive fallout.) Far from the explosion, trees, houses, the clothes people wear spontaneously burst into flames. As yet, not a sound has been heard.

Then, as thunder follows lightning, a shock wave of crushing power rushes out from the epicenter, leveling buildings, bridges and monuments. It is followed by winds many times the force of a hurricane, which rip the landscape to shreds and toss people around in the air like leaves.

Seconds after the explosion on the White House, the fireball reaches from Dupont Circle to the Tidal Basin and from 6th Street to 25th Street NW. Everything—cars, buildings, trees, monuments and all living things—is engulfed. On a clear day, the flash from the one explosion is visible beyond Frederick, Md., some 40 miles away.

Two pulses of thermal radiation fly out from the center. The first, ultraviolet, causes eye damage or blindness. The second, infrared pulse lasts longer and inflicts first-degree burns on students walking around the University of Maryland campus in College Park, more than 11 miles away. It ignites trash and newspapers and sets clothing on fire in Seat Pleasant, 7 miles away. Multiple fires flash up all over the city—particularly in frame buildings such as those in Cleveland Park, and in offices with paper-strewn desks.

The explosion creates a crater just short of a half a mile across, and this material follows the fireball as it rises some 12 miles in the sky. The cloud cools from a reddish brown to white and spreads out into the familiar mushroom shape.

One-tenth of a second after the explosion, a tremendous shock wave, like a 1,000-foot tidal wave, roars out from the center, completely engulfing what pass for tall buildings in Washington. As one writer describes the effect of such a shock wave on buildings, "It squeezes them as a giant fist would . . . the blast from a bomb of this energy almost completely destroys all buildings within 2 miles of the explosion and severely damages everything up to 3 miles."

The blast wave destroys by overpressure, or that amount of pressure beyond the normal. Normally, we feel 14.7 pounds per square inch all around us. With overpressure, we are like divers under water—the deeper, the greater the pressure. People are less damaged by overpressure than buildings—we're more flexible—but the buildings often land on the people.

The same devastation takes place at the Pentagon and the other two blast sites. Pentagon City and Crystal City are reduced to piles of rubble and glass. Homes are leveled in Arlington, Glen Echo and Cabin John. Most of the shiny office buildings in Rosslyn are damaged beyond repair. Morningside and Camp Springs are mashed to ground level.

Not all the damage is uniform. As a shock wave passes, it creates various reflected waves which bounce back from the buildings. The combined results can be even stronger than the original shock wave.

Directly behind the shock wave, tremendous winds (250 miles an hour 2 miles from the blast center) topple many of those structures that are still standing. These winds uproot trees and toss them around, turn shards of glass into miniature missiles and blow bricks and aluminum siding around like feathers.

Even at some distance from the blasts, the shock plus wind damage is extensive. At the National Institutes of Health, the buildings are squeezed by overpressures sufficient to crack and weaken masonry and then buffeted by winds of close to 90 miles an hour. The laboratories disintegrate to a shambles of broken glass and squealing guinea pigs. The winds clog Wisconsin Avenue with fallen trees and tangled electrical wires.

But the electrical wires are useless anyway. Experts figure that you can count out the electricity at overpressures of 2 to 5 pounds per square inch or more—a radius of between 2½ and 4½ miles from the blast centers. There is a massive blackout.

In addition, gas and water pipes burst all over, setting additional fires and simultaneously losing the means of extinguishing them. Whether the shock wave and the high winds have put out some of the fires started by the heat pulse is unclear. But those that are not extinguished spread from house to house, setting additional fires many miles away days later.

Contrary to some popular conceptions, there probably is no firestorm. Washington is not sufficiently built up. Documented firestorms occurred in Dresden and Hamburg in World War II after incendiary bombs were rained on both cities expressly to create fires. However, one expert at DCPA estimates that in the damage areas "we would have fire damage of the kind we had during the 1968 riots."

In 1968, though, Washington had three separate fire corridors scattered across the city. This time, the fires start in Arlington, Bethesda and sections of Prince Georges' County as well as downtown, but they spread and merge, moving eastward fanned by the prevailing winds. Ultimately, a good part of the metropolitan area is threatened by uncontrolled conflagration.

And the people? On a normal weekday, there are some 1.4 million people in the District of Columbia, about three-quarters of them concentrated in the area of heaviest damage. Although many of the residents of Arlington quit their high-rise apartments during the day, many work in the Pentagon, Arlington and Alexandria.

Anyone close to the explosions, within about one and three-quarter miles, has probably been killed—even if they made it to a shelter—unless by some chance they survived in a massive basement or a subway tunnel. If so, they are severely injured or trapped by fallen debris. So close to the explosion, there is no chance for rescue; roads are impassable and the area heavily contaminated with early fallout.

Three miles from the blast, in District Heights or Bethesda, half the people are killed and nearly half injured. Those who survive are on their own to figure out how to "lurch and stumble toward help," according to one civil defense expert. In Vienna or Kensington, a quarter of the people are injured by the Langley blast, 7 miles away.

Many of the injuries to people in the 2-5-mile radius come from flying debris and collapsing buildings. In addition, the fierce winds pick people up and hurl them against walls and trees. Many are injured from burns if they did not take immediate shelter or if they got caught in the spreading fires.

It has been estimated that two dozen severe burn victims would tax the city's best burn treatment facilities to the limit; in a nuclear attack, there are many thousands. As the civil defense planners put it, "Medical services would be on the level of the Crimean War. Those who survived their injuries would be those who could get themselves to help."

And, in reality, many of those injured will ultimately succumb to radiation sickness. These effects of radiation add an invisible, unpredictable threat to any nuclear explosion, and most especially to a large, ground burst. If four 1-megaton warheads landed at ground level in the Washington area, the radiation danger might affect as many people downwind as the blasts themselves.

Of all the calculations you can make about the effects of nuclear weapons, those about fallout are the least sure. Fallout patterns drawn by planners resemble neat little cigar shapes, with one end on the blast center and the other reaching downwind in a consistent pattern. But fallout patterns from real blasts are amoeboid shapes, with uneven borders and many hot spots and cool spots in unpredictable places. Fallout actually drifts like snow and may pile up on one side of a wall and leave the other relatively cool—but you can't tell without monitoring equipment. You only know you've had an overdose of radioactivity by the symptoms.

The symptoms are not pleasant. Nausea, vomiting and diarrhea are the openers, followed by loss of hair, ulceration of the skin and bleeding. Death, if and when it occurs, is by infection which the body has no strength to resist. It can take weeks to die of radiation sickness.

The heaviest fallout reaches the Chesapeake Bay, 30 miles downwind, about three hours after the explosion, although some fallout settles near the site of the blast within about 15 minutes. Anyone near the blast area who is not very well protected is killed by the early radiation. It takes about 500 rads (a typical diagnostic abdominal X-ray uses about a quarter of a rad) to kill more than 50 per cent of the people, and considerably less (250 rads) to kill some—children, old people, the sick.

In the very high radiation areas, within some 5 miles downwind of the blast, fallout is radiating to the level of 500 to 1,000 rads an hour at the peak. Then, slowly, the rate of radiation falls off, but not to "safe" levels for weeks or more. (There is a good deal of discussion about what a safe level is. Some contend there is no safe level. Even dental X-rays pose a problem. The Civil Defense people are most concerned with survival for six months, not six years. So late-appearing cancers are not counted in their calculations.)

Annapolis, for example, is 35 miles east of Langley. As our prevailing winds blow west to east, it is fair to assume that Annapolis would have to live underground for a while. If the winds shifted to blow from the south, as winds are likely to do at times, Baltimore could be affected. However, it also is safe to assume that if four warheads landed on Washington, Baltimore might well have received a megaton or two on its own.

The fallout patterns would, most likely, blanket all areas east of Washington to the Chesapeake Bay with enough fallout to require spending two weeks underground. Farther away, on the Eastern Shore, the chickens would fare better than their owners. Chickens can withstand a lot of radiation, and they get slaughtered before they get cancer.

But would we be able to stay underground for two weeks? Psychiatrist Jerome D. Frank, vice chairman of the Federation of American Scientists, confesses to some doubts. "It is difficult enough to find suitable candidates for space missions or for submarine duty," he notes, "and those projects are slowly and carefully planned for. There is no element of fear or panic, as there would be with an attack . . . Here they talk about a group of strangers all cooped up together, not knowing where their loved ones are, or if they have survived or are dying slowly. They don't know if they have radiation sickness already; they don't know what is going on outside or what will be left when they get out . . . And remember, the symptoms of extreme anxiety may be the same as the first symptoms of radiation sickness." And he adds with irony that, though radiation sickness is not contagious, vomiting in a tight, confining space certainly is.

In the accounts following the bombing of Hiroshima and Nagasaki, there are grim stories of a population glazed by fear, or parents wandering through the streets looking for their dead children, oblivious to their pain or to the possibility of further attack. Others could not be prodded to move from where they huddled, even if relative safety were within sight. If a parent had managed to go to a shelter without his or her child, could that parent stay sheltered for two weeks without knowing what had happened?

Civil defense experts agree that the number of survivors from a nuclear attack would depend greatly on how much warning time there was. Generally, it is agreed that a major attack would not happen "out of the blue" but after a worsening political situation that would put everyone on edge. George Rodericks has testified that 30,000 to 40,000 Washington-area residents spontaneously "evacuated" the city during the 1962 Cuban missile crisis. But many more did not leave the city for safety in the hills.

If everyone fled to the hills to the west before the attack, there would obviously be fewer deaths from the blast—unless the Soviets decided to knock out Mount Weather, one of the homes away from home that the government has set aside for its top officials in time of nuclear danger.

But if the attack came on a midweek morning, after rising tensions but before a presidential order to evacuate, deaths and severe casualties in the Washington area would be close to a million.

This assumes that only Washington is hit, so that emergency medical services, fresh water, uncontaminated food, blankets and other relief can all be brought in to the survivors. It assumes that the rest of the nation would rush to aid the stricken capital. Yet that assumption is open to question.

Any nation that went for the capital of a country with such huge retaliatory powers would be crazy not to try to knock out our missile silos, our submarine bases and our Strategic Air Command bases. Under these circumstances, the picture would be quite different. Writing in Scientific American, physicists Sidney Drell of Stanford University and Frank Von Hippel of Princeton projected a situation in which the fallout from Soviet strikes against missile silos on the Great Plains would creep eastward to Virginia. With the unknown millions dead and injured even after a "limited" attack, Washington would be on its own to cope with possible epidemics, starvation, total social dislocation, and perhaps even an invasion of insects. (Cockroaches appeared on the earth before human beings and will likely outlast us. They practically thrive on radiation.)

The Civil Defense Preparedness Agency has published a scenario entitled "The Nuclear Crisis of 1979," in which the United States is attacked with a total of 5,000 megatons. In the imaginary year after, this most optimistic of agencies concluded, "There are still regions of the country which people simply avoid. The Eastern Megalopolis, for example, is a nightmare which is usually observed by airplane. Otherwise entering that region means that you would pick up an extra dose of radiation." In another section this evaluation of cities after an attack appears: "Increasingly the central cities were to become havens for 'derelicts' of society—those who took chances with alcohol, drugs, crime and nuclear threats . . . .

INFLATION

Mr. GARN. Mr. President, two problems are facing the Carter administration: The energy bill, now in conference between the House and Senate, and the slide of the dollar on foreign money markets. Let me suggest that there may be a connection.

Of course, not all the dollar's problems are caused by the increasing share of our energy needs that we must import, but it is undeniable that buying 45 percent of your oil overseas contributes to your trade imbalance. To the extent that the dollar's problems are tied to oil imports, the solution is simple: Remove controls over domestic energy. Imports would decrease, domestic production would increase, the dollar would begin to recover, and all would be well. Energy prices might go up, though there is a growing body of evidence that confirms economic theory that U.S. gasoline prices are already at world market prices. But even if they did, that would be preferable to the destruction of our economy which result from continued oil imports and the accompanying destruction of the dollar.

Mr. President, an editorial from Forbes magazine makes many of these same points. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows.

FACT AND COMMENT

(By Malcolm S. Forbes)

OVERNIGHT CARTER COULD CURE THE DOLLAR'S SICKNESS

The sharp rate of the dollar's decline won't be cured but only slowed by the Administration's new, now-sincere effort to firm up the buck. Federal Reserve fiddling with interest rates is not unlike giving painkillers to cancer patients.

It's not a cure and soon has most disastrous side effects. The cost for the Treasury's ongoing multibillion borrowings at the higher interest will shove the federal deficit deeply deeper. The government itself will thus fire inflation flames.

Everyone agrees that the problem is the incredible and ceaselessly climbing $billions we spend to import oil.

The day President Carter has the sense to see the need for—and the guts to ask for—the freeing of price ceilings on fuel, on gas (natural and liquid), virtually every objective he seeks becomes achievable.

Overnight.

The dollar will rebound because we know that, before 12 months have passed after such a presidential move, additional internal energy sources will be coming on stream. The initial added energy trickle will swiftly be a stream. Under present and proposed restrictions, energy companies that face a loss bringing in new supplies can be sued for irresponsible use of stockholder assets.

Profiteering?

What isn't spent developing new and additional sources can be largely taxed away by Washington—where I little doubt they will find the means of disposing of these princely sums.

The stock market will climb and climb.

Confidence indices of both consumers and companies will climb and climb.

So will business expansion, meaning more jobs—real jobs. Not federal make-work.

Instead of Carter being a villain for the increased fuels costs that he seeks, people can go right on blaming the oil companies, and they in turn can go right on trying to enlighten the public.

Everywhere else in the Free World motorists pay from a buck and a half to over $2 a gallon for fuel. As the Times of London commented in an editorial (reprinted in the Wall Street Journal): "A nation running an enormous deficit in order to avoid proper energy prices, and in order to keep the temperature of its homes and offices cooler in summer than in winter, does not make economic sense to the rest of the world." By making the cost of developing additional in-house energy profitless, our government is subsidizing, through the exports of $billions for imported oil, cheap fuel for the consumer and is endangering—everyday, more so—the dollar, Free World trade, U.S. credit and credibility.

"Oh, say, can you see?" Mr. President?

INFLATION'S NO MORE BEATABLE THAN ANY OTHER TAX

Just as there are blamed few ways to avoid—legally—any other tax, so too it's almost impossible to beat inflation's "take" from your take-home pay.

Inflation is not a mysterious Something Out There.

It's a wickedly regressive, painfully unhidden tax. It's only the terminology that makes it seem to be something else.

On the face of it, it seems so simple to pass, as Congress has done, a law that provides extreme penalties for any "bribing" of foreign officials by American corporations. The new law provides for a $1-million fine for a guilty company, with up to five years imprisonment and/or fines of up to $10,000 for the corporate officials involved—double the fine for those convicted of price-fixing.

As the President said when he signed the bill, "I share Congress' belief that bribery is ethically repugnant and competitively unnecessary."

No doubt about it—ethically repugnant.

Competitively unnecessary? Dream on.

In probably more countries than any reader can name offhand—there are now, you know, 220 of 'em—Who Gets the Order is determined by Who Places the Order. And the latter Whos, by long, rarely broken tradition, expect/demand their cut . . . call it commission, reimbursement or some other euphemism. Only when the product or service has no competition or when essential credit is supplied does the seller have clout beyond that of the buyer.

Regretting this is so doesn't make it less so. The new law, be it ever so applaudable, will mean less exports of U.S. goods and services, more sales for our foreign competitors.

Virtue has its price.

Isn't it wonderful that we can afford to pay it?

VIEWS OF DEAN LOUIS POLLAK ON THE PANAMA CANAL TREATY

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, one of this country's outstanding constitutional lawyers is Dean Louis Pollak of the University of Pennsylvania Law School.

Dean Pollak, who has also been dean of the Yale Law School, has had a varied career including private practice and experience in Government; he has written a major work on "The Constitution and the Supreme Court." He has been studying the Panama Canal Treaties and carefully following the debate now taking place on the constitutional issues these treaties present. One of the most important of these is the treaty power in relation to the transfer of U.S. property and territory, a matter of great interest to the Senate.

He has sent me a short paper summarizing his views, which I believe will be highly informative to all taking part in the consideration of these treaties.

His conclusions are, first, that the Supreme Court has recognized that there is a power to dispose by treaty of territory belonging to United States which is independent of the concurrent congressional power, and second, that the discussion in the constitutional Convention of 1787 confirms the settled understanding of our treatymakers and of the Supreme Court that territory belonging to the United States may be ceded by treaty.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Dean Pollak's analysis be printed, in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CAN THE UNITED STATES CEDE TO PANAMA, BY TREATY, UNITED STATES RIGHTS IN THE TERRITORY AND INSTALLATIONS OF THE CANAL ZONE?

On November 4, 1977, Senator Allen placed in the Congressional Record a statement by Raoul Berger, former Charles Warren Fellow at Harvard University, made in hearings on the Panama Canal Treaties held by the Senate Subcommittee on Separation of Powers. The thrust of Mr. Berger's statement was that cession to the Republic of Panama of such title as the United States possesses in (1) territory in the Canal Zone, and (2) United States installations in the Zone, cannot constitutionally be effectuated by treaty, but only by statute, for the reason that the disposition of territory and other property of the United States is vested by Article IV, § 3(2) of the Constitution exclusively in Congress. Mr. Berger is a constitutional lawyer and historian of great distinction, whose scholarly work has enriched our understanding of many aspects of the Constitution, and so it is appropriate to pay close attention to his views on major constitutional questions. Nonetheless, careful examination of the arguments advanced by Mr. Berger persuades me that in this instance he is in error. It is my submission that the proposed treaties with Panama, if consented to by the constitutionally required two-thirds of the Senate and duly ratified by the executive branch, will of their own force accomplish the cession to Panama of the territory and the installations in question:

A. THE DEVELOPMENT OF TREATY PRACTICE AND TREATY DOCTRINE

1. Broadly stated, Mr. Berger's thesis is that the treaty power, which the Constitution vests in the President and the Senate but does not define, cannot be read as giving to the President and the Senate powers concurrent with the powers specifically delegated to Congress by Article I, § 8, Article IV, § 3(2), and other provisions of the Constitution.

2. The thesis is not a new one. It was strongly advanced in 1795, in opposition to the Jay Treaty; and it was strongly resisted by no less a constitutional authority than John Marshall—the Virginia legislator who was later to be a Congressman, then Secretary of State and finally Chief Justice. Beveridge, in his authoritative biography of Marshall, sums up the argument:

"Among the many objections to the treaty, the principal one . . . was that it violated the Constitution. The treaty regulated commerce; the Constitution gave that power to Congress, which included the House of Representatives; yet the House had not been consulted. . . .

". . . Marshall's position was that a 'treaty is as completely a valid and obligatory contract when negotiated by the President and ratified by him, with the assent and advice of the Senate, as if sanctioned by the House of Representatives also, under a constitution requiring such sanction'; and he admitted only that the powers of the House in reference to a treaty were limited to granting or refusing appropriations to carry it into effect." [1]

3. Marshall's position anticipated the pattern which has in fact characterized the utilization of the treaty power. As Secretary of State (former Congressman, former Senator and former Vice President) John C. Calhoun observed in 1844, "From the beginning and throughout the whole existence of the Federal Government it has been exercised constantly on commerce, navigation and other delegated powers." O. Wright, The Control of American Foreign Relations (1922) 344. Moreover, such treaty provisions have routinely been treated as self-executing except where, as Professor Louis Henkin has put it in his definitive work, "the treaty-makers voluntarily left some subjects to regulation by Congress (e.g., international tariffs and trade). . . ." Henkin, Foreign Affairs and the Constitution (1972) 149. Although the treaty-makers have generally supposed the treaty power to be concurrent with that of Congress with respect to commercial regulations, the disposition of American territory and other government property, and most of the other powers expressly lodged in Congress by the Constitution (and have routinely been sustained in this supposition), they have customarily felt obliged to seek statutory implementation of treaties touching the area of Congressional authority with respect to which Marshall felt action by the House of Representatives was constitutionally indispensable:—namely, "granting . . . appropriations." The reason for acknowledging an exclusivity in Congress with respect to the appropriations power, but not with respect to most of its other powers (the regulation of commerce, the disposition of the property of the United States, etc.) arises from the text of the Constitution. Most legislative powers are merely couched in the familiar phrase, "Congress shall have power . . ."—a phrase which, syntactically, does not preclude concurrent authority in the President and Senate as treaty-makers. But the spending power, although couched in the same general form, is also subject to an express constitutional limitation—"No money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in Consequence of Appropriations made by Law . . ." [Article I, § 9(7)]—a limitation which arguably requires statutory implementation of a treaty commitment to make expenditures.[2]

4. The thesis which John Marshall steadfastly resisted in 1795 was adopted by Marshall's great rival, Thomas Jefferson, in his Manual of Parliamentary Practice. Jefferson—who as Secretary of State, Vice President and President "was no friend of the Treaty Power," [Henkin, supra at 142]—set forth four propositions, the second and fourth of which were as follows: "2. By the general power to make treaties, the Constitution must have intended to comprehend only those subjects which are usually regulated by treaty, and can not be otherwise regulated . . . 4. And also to except those subjects of legislation in which it gave a participation to the House of Representatives." Ibid. Marshall was not the only one of Jefferson's great contemporaries who was unpersuaded by Jefferson's narrow view of the treaty power. Justice Story noted that "The power 'to make treaties' is by the Constitution general; and of course it embraces all sorts of treaties, for peace or war; for commerce or territory; for alliance or succours; for indemnity for injuries or payments of debts; for the recognition and enforcement of principles of public law; and for any other purposes, which the policy or interests of independent sovereigns may dictate in their intercourse with each other." III J. Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States (1833) 355. Story acknowledged that the treaty power was not unlimited; "A treaty to change the organization of the government, or annihilate its sovereignty, to overturn its republican form, or to deprive it of its constitutional powers, would be void; because it would destroy, what it was designed merely to fulfill, the will of the people. Whether there are any other restrictions, necessarily growing out of the structure of the government, will remain to be considered, whenever the exigency shall arise." Id. at 356. And then, in a footnote, Story dispatched Jefferson's constitutional doubtings: "Mr. Jefferson seems at one time to have thought that the Constitution only meant to authorize the president and senate to carry into effect, by way of treaty, any power they might constitutionally exercise. At the same time, he admits, that he was sensible of the weak points of this position. 4 Jefferson's Corresp. 498. What are such powers given to the president and senate? Could they make appointments by treaty?" [3]

5. Marshall and Story were early expositors of what—Jefferson and a few others apart—has always been the orthodox view that the President and the Senate, in making treaties, can regulate almost every subject matter also entrusted to the legislative authority of Congress. But it fell to Calhoun—speaking as a Congressman, a quarter-century before he became Secretary of State—to explain, with more precision than either of the great Justices achieved, the scope of the treaty power and the constraints which other parts of the Constitution impose upon its exercise [29 Annals of Congress 530–31 (Jan. 9, 1816)]:

"The grant of the power to make treaties is couched in the most general terms. The words of the Constitution are that the President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senate concur. In a subsequent part of the Constitution, treaties are declared to be the supreme law of the land. Whatever limits are imposed in those general terms ought to be the results of the construction of the instrument. There appeared to him but two restrictions on its exercise; the one derived from the nature of our Government, and the other from that of the power itself. Most certainly all grants of power under the Constitution must be controlled by that instrument; for, having their existence from it, they must of necessity assume that form which the Constitution has imposed. This is acknowledged to be true of the legislative power, and it is doubtless equally so of the power to make treaties. The limits of the former are exactly marked; it was necessary to prevent collision with similar co-existing State powers. This country is divided into many distinct sovereignties. Exact enumeration here is necessary to prevent the most dangerous consequences. The enumeration of legislative power in the Constitution has relation then, not to the treaty-power, but to the powers of the State. In our relation to the rest of the world the case is reversed. Here the States disappear. Divided within, we present the exterior of undivided sovereignty. The wisdom of the Constitution appears conspicuous. When enumeration was needed, there we find the powers enumerated and exactly defined; when not, we do not find what would be vain and pernicious. Whatever, then, concerns our foreign relations; whatever requires the consent of another nation, belongs to the treaty power; can only be regulated by it; and it is competent to regulate all such subjects; provided, and here are its true limits, such regulations are not inconsistent with the Constitution. If so they are void. No treaty can alter the fabric of our Government, nor can it do that which the Constitution has expressly forbade to be done; nor can it do that differently which is directed to be done in a given mode, and all other modes prohibited. For instance, the Constitution of the United States says, no money 'shall be drawn out of the Treasury by by an appropriation made by law.' Of course no subsidy can be granted without an act of law and a treaty of alliance could not involve the country in war without the consent of this House." . . .

6. As Professor Henkin recently observed, Jefferson's conception of the treaty power "would outlaw treaties on matters as to which Congress could legislate domestically" and thus "would virtually wipe out the Treaty Power." Henkin, supra at 149. But Jefferson's conception, as Professor Quincy Wright stated over half a century ago, was "both erroneous and incomplete." Wright, supra at 123.

It is a conception which, as Professor Henkin has noted, "[e]ven in Jefferson's day . . . was hardly accepted by all; it has now been long dead. Treaties have dealt with many matters that were also subject to legislation. . . . The House of Representatives has frequently bristled, but its exclusion from the treaty process was the clear constitutional plan. . . ." Henkin, supra at 149. In short, Calhoun has won the day.

7. Among the many legislative powers which can also be exercised by treaty is the particular power which Mr. Berger would deny to the treaty-makers—the power to dispose of American territory and other property. The matter was clearly put over sixty years ago by Dr. Samuel Crandall in his illuminating comparative study of the treaty power:

"In respect of territory not within the boundaries of a State, the central government exercises, subject to the express prohibitions of the Constitution applicable thereto, all the powers of government enjoyed by both the central and State governments over territory within the limits of a State. Accordingly, the power to cede such territory, if it exists as a power of government, resides in the organs of the central government. That the consent of the inhabitants of the territory to be ceded is essential to give validity to the transfer cannot be maintained. The power to cede outlying territory is no less essential to the full exercise of the treaty-making power of the United States, which "extends to all the proper subjects of negotiation between our government and the governments of other nations," than is the power to acquire. Various treaties have been concluded by which the United States has relinquished extra-territorial rights theretofore enjoyed in other countries." [4]

B. JUDICIAL RECOGNITION THAT THERE IS A TREATY POWER TO DISPOSE OF AMERICAN TERRITORY WHICH IS INDEPENDENT OF THE CONCURRENT CONGRESSIONAL POWER

1. Dr. Crandall, as Mr. Berger has observed, is "a respected commentator." Text of Berger Statement, at note 42. But the decisive question is whether Dr. Crandall's view of the treaty power—incompatible with Jefferson's, but consonant with that of Marshall, Story, and Calhoun (and Professors Wright and Henkin)—is in accord with the views expressed by the Supreme Court. The answer is in the affirmative.

2. "It is settled," said the unanimous Court in Jones v. Meehan, 175 U.S. 1, 16 (1899), "that a good title to parts of the lands of an Indian tribe may be granted to individuals by a treaty between the United States and the tribe, without any act of Congress, or any patent from the Executive authority of the United States." This proposition, validating the power to alienate American territory by treaty, was central to the disposition of Jones v. Meehan. The principal issue before the Court was whether the Treaty with the Chippewas of 1863 conveyed full title to Chief Moose Dung of "six hundred and forty acres near the mouth of Thief River." The Court's holding was that:

"The title to the strip of land in controversy having been granted by the United States to the elder chief Moose Dung by the treaty itself, and having descended, upon his death, by the laws, customs and usages of the tribe, to his eldest son and successor as chief, Moose Dung the younger, passed by the lease executed by the latter in 1891 to the plaintiffs for the term of that lease; and their rights under that lease could not be divested by any subsequent action of the lessor, or of Congress, or of the Executive Departments. The construction of treaties is the peculiar province of the judiciary; and except in cases purely political, Congress has no constitutional power to settle the rights under a treaty, or to affect titles already granted by the treaty itself." [5]

3. The Court's holding in Jones v. Meehan is consistent not only with its earlier pronouncement in Holden v. Joy, 84 U.S. 211, 247 (1872) ("On the contrary, there are many authorities where it is held that a treaty may convey to a grantee a good title to such lands (lands which belonged to the United States) without an act of Congress conferring it, and that Congress has no constitutional power to settle or interfere with rights under treaties, except in cases purely political"), but with its classic formulation of the scope of the treaty power in Geofroy v. Riggs:

"The treaty power, as expressed in the Constitution, is in terms unlimited except by those restraints which are found in that instrument against the action of the government or of its departments, and those arising from the nature of the government and that of the States. It would not be contended that it extends so far as to authorize what the Constitution forbids, or a change in the character of the Government or in that of one of the States, or a cession of any portion of the territory of the latter, without its consent. Fort Leavenworth Railroad Co. v. Lowe, 114 U.S. 525, 541. But with these exceptions, it is not perceived that there is any limit to the questions which can be adjusted touching any matter which is properly the subject of negotiation with a foreign country." [6]

4. Whether, as the Court said, the Constitution precludes treaty cession of territory within a state without the state's consent, may be debatable, for the Constitution does not in terms so confine the treaty power (or the concurrent legislative power to dispose of federal territory). Nonetheless the dictum is one which conforms at least in spirit to the Constitution's insistence that new states not be created out of the territory of existing states without the consent of the state or states affected. Article I, § 3(1).

And considerations of prudence would seem to support such a constraint on the exercise of the treaty power. (See the Court's discussion, in Fort Leavenworth Railroad Co. v. Lowe [cited in Geofroy v. Riggs] of the procedures followed in fashioning the Webster-Ashburton Treaty [the Washington Treaty of 1842], settling the long-vexed questions surrounding the United States-Canadian boundary: Justice Field noted that "it was deemed necessary on the part of our government to secure the cooperation and concurrence of Maine, so far as such settlement might involve a cession of her sovereignty and jurisdiction as well as title to territory claimed by her, and of Massachusetts, so far as it might involve a cession of title to lands held by her"). [7] In any event, it is plain that no consent, whether of the inhabitants or of Congress, is necessary where, as in the proposed Panama treaties, the land to be ceded by treaty is not located in a state. [8]

C. THE DISCUSSION IN THE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION CONFIRMS THE SETTLED UNDERSTANDING OF OUR TREATY-MAKERS AND OF THE SUPREME COURT THAT AMERICAN TERRITORY MAY BE CEDED BY TREATY

1. The discussion of the treaty power in the Constitutional Convention plainly discloses the awareness of the framers that treaties might frequently be a mechanism for the cession of territory. Indeed, as Mr. Berger's Addendum shows, this awareness manifested itself more than once in proposals to surround the treaty-making process with special safeguards when it involved the cession of territory.

2. One such proposal would have stipulated "that no Treaty shall be made without the concurrence of the House of Representatives, by which the territorial boundaries of the United States may be contracted. . . ." IV Farrand, The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787 (1937 ed.) 58. This proposal, advanced on September 7, 1787—very late in the Convention's deliberations—"was then debated, but the motion does not appear to have been made."

3. The lapsed motion of September 7 evidently reflected concern at the great power proposed to be lodged in two-thirds of the Senate. But there were counter-concerns—some members of the Convention were troubled at permitting one-third-plus-one of the Senate to block treaty ratification. Thus, on September 8, Rufus King "moved to strike out the 'exception of Treaties of peace' from the general clause requiring two-thirds of the Senate for making Treaties," and James Wilson then urged that "the requisition of two-thirds . . . be struck out altogether." And at this point, "A reconsideration of the whole clause was agreed to." II Farrand 547–48.

4. In the course of the ensuing debate, Roger Sherman stated that he "was agst leaving the rights, established by the Treaty of Peace, to the Senate, & moved to annex a 'proviso [sic] that no such rights shd be ceded without the sanction of the Legislature." According to Madison's notes, "Mr. Govr. Morris seconded the idea of Mr. Sherman." Nonetheless, the proposal of September 8, like the proposal of September 7, does not appear to have ever been put to a vote.

5. Mr. Berger, in his Addendum, mentions the September 7 proposal and speculates on the inference to be drawn from the failure of the Convention to pursue the matter:

"Why was the motion not made after debate? Presumably, the matter was postponed for consideration [when Article IV,] Section 3(2) would come up for discussion. During this subsequent discussion of "The Legislature shall have power to dispose of . . . the territory. . . .", it is singular that no mention was made of an exception for disposition under the treaty power. II Farrand 466. Non-mention is the more remarkable because such an exception would carve out an area of undefined magnitude from the power conferred, a matter which would affront the democratically minded who placed their faith in the House. It seems more reasonable to infer from the history that Article IV, Section 3(2) was designed to set at rest the fears that territory might be ceded without the concurrence of the House."

6. Mr. Berger's inference might be thought to have some modest plausibility if the discussion of Article IV, § (2), to which Mr. Berger refers (the discussion summarized at II Farrand 466), had in fact been "subsequent" to the discussion of the treaty power. But it was not. The discussion of Article IV § 3(2) referred to by Mr. Berger took place on August 30, a little over a week prior to the debate on the treaty power adverted to above.

Conclusion

As noted earlier in this memorandum, the thesis put forward by Mr. Berger is essentially the narrow Jeffersonian conception of the treaty power which would "outlaw treaties on matters as to which Congress could legislate domestically"—a conception which "has now been long dead." Henkin, supra, at 149. In a sense, then, it seems anomalous to be reexamining this ground in 1978. And the anomaly is only underscored by the fact that, in our own time, the major constitutional debate about the scope of the treaty power has been of a wholly different nature: Can the treaty-makers, through the exercise of their authority to act on all matters of international concern, empower Congress to enact legislation going beyond its specifically enumerated grants of power?

Yes, the Supreme Court held, in Missouri v. Holland.[9] Is the treaty power then wholly unrestrained, provided it is exercised in an area of international concern? No, the Supreme Court announced, in Reid v. Covert:[10] the treaty-makers, like all other departments of government, are restrained by those prohibitions—most notably, those embodied in the Bill of Rights—to which all actions taken under the authority of the United States must conform. In sum, since 1920, when Missouri v. Holland was decided, the active questions as to the scope of the treaty power have grown out of the perception that the treaty power is, at least in theory, broader than the power of Congress to enact domestic legislation. Those questions are no longer as significant as they once were—in part because of the limitations on the treaty power announced in Reid v. Covert, and in part because the domestic legislative authority of Congress is now acknowledged to be far broader than was perceived half a century ago. In any event, the proposition that the treaty power is infinitely narrower than the Congressional power—the clear implication of the Jeffersonian conception which Mr. Berger has now revived—is a constitutional anachronism.[11]

If the proposed treaties with Panama are approved by a two-thirds vote of the Senate, and duly ratified, they will, in my judgment, of their own force effectuate the cession to Panama of American title to the land and installations of the Canal Zone.

APPENDIX A

Exchange of Letters Between Governor Edward Everett and Mr. Justice Joseph Story, Taken From II, W. W. Story, Life and Letters of Joseph Story [1851], pp. 286–89:

To Hon. Joseph Story.

BOSTON, APRIL 14, 1838.

MY DEAR SIR: The legislature has adopted some resolves relative to the Northeastern Boundary of the United States, which have been presented to me for my official signature. One of them is in the following terms:

"Resolved, That no power delegated by the Constitution to the government of the United States authorizes them to cede to a foreign nation any territory lying within the limits of either of the States in the Union."

I beg leave to ask your opinion, (to be given confidentially or otherwise as you may deem proper,) whether you consider the principle asserted in this resolve, as a well-settled doctrine of Constitutional Law. I have carefully read what is said of the treaty-making power in your Commentaries, Volume iii. p. 354, et seq. At the close of § 1502, you name certain restrictions on the treaty-making power, which must be assumed; but that of ceding a part of a State is not one of them. You add, however, the remark, "Whether there are any other restrictions necessarily growing out of the structure of the government will remain to be considered whenever the exigency shall arise."

The restriction in question (if it exist) must be one of this character, and I should prefer to follow your wise counsel, and let it remain to be considered, when the exigency arises. The present controversy does not appear to me to create such an exigency, for it is a question not of ceding an admitted portion of the territory of Maine, but of ascertaining the boundary between the British territory and ours. The resolve of the legislature, however, raises the abstract question, and I wish your advice, whether I can safely affirm it.

I am, dear Sir, with the highest respect, And Sincere attachment,

Faithfully yours,

EDWARD EVERETT.

I would observe, that it is my present inclination, if I do not sign the Resolves, to let them pass sub silentio, as they are only expressions of the opinions of the legislature.

CAMBRIDGE, APRIL 17, 1838.

To His Excellency Edward Everett.

MY DEAR SIR: In reply to your favor of the 14th inst. which I received by yesterday's mail, I beg to say, that I consider the Resolve referred to as very objectionable as a matter of Constitutional Law, I cannot admit it to be universally true, that the Constitution of the United States does not authorize the government of the United States "to cede to a foreign nation any territory within the limits of the States of the Union." If the proposition is true, then in case of a war, it would be incompetent for the government by a treaty to cede any territory conquered during the war, and which might be indispensable to purchase peace. So a cession could not be made, even with the assent of the State within which the territory was situated; for neither the State nor the United States could alone cede it, and then both could not. Yet the cession might be of a nature calculated for the safety of both nations, and might be an equivalent for a like cession on the other side.

I remember to have had some conversation with Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, some years ago, when the subject was under discussion, with reference to the contested boundary in Maine. He was unequivocally of opinion, that the treaty-making power did extend to cases of cession of territory, though he would not undertake to say that it could extend to all cases; yet he did not doubt it must be construed to extend to some.

It appears to me that our legislature have very unnecessarily, and (as I think also) against our true public policy with reference to the contested boundary of Maine, stated this proposition. It may embarrass the government in its negotiations; and it is wholly gratuitous, — since, in a case of contested boundary, there is no pretence to say that an ascertainment of the true boundary involves the question of cession.

I always look with alarm and regret upon all attempts of our legislatures to settle constitutional questions in the heat of controversy, and under the impulses of party. Nor do I think that Massachusetts ought to commit herself upon any doctrine of this sort, at this time. I doubt its soundness; but I do not at all doubt its inexpediency. The time may arrive when our very existence and salvation as a nation, may depend upon the exercise of this very power. If the national government does not possess it, it is to all intents and purposes an extinguished right of sovereignty, for the States do not possess or retain it.

I see no objection to your leaving the resolve to its constitutional operation, sub silentio, if you think it best not to return it to the legislature with objections. I think the doubt of a constitutional point furnishes of itself a sufficient ground for rejecting a resolve embodying a positive declaration of it, unless there be an absolute necessity for some declaration on the subject.

What I have written I must ask you to consider as confidential, though I do not mean by this to say that I should object to its being seen by any of our confidential friends, such as Mr. Webster, if you should wish to consult him.

Believe me, with the highest respect,

Truly yours,

JOSEPH STORY.

For tactical purposes, Marshall seems also to have argued that the Jay Treaty was so drawn as to leave to the House of Representatives leeway to determine whether to implement the commercial aspects of the Treaty; but this tactical concession respecting the form of a particular treaty was not at odds with Marshall's constitutional definition of the potential scope of the treaty power. Ibid.

[2] I say "arguably" because no such restraint on the treaty power was intimated by the Supreme Court in its classic exposition of the scope of the power in Geofroy v. Riggs, 133 U.S. 258, 267 (1890), quoted in the text infra, at note 6. Textual analysis akin to that dealing with the appropriations power provides an arguable basis for concluding that treaties cannot, without statutory implementation, levy taxes, since the Constitution specifies that "all Bills for raising Revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives." Article I, § 7(1). Congress' power to declare war may also be another power not shared by the treatymakers. See the quotation from Calhoun in the text, infra at n. 3.

[3] Ibid. at n. 2 (emphasis in original). That Story and Marshall were well aware that the treaty power includes authority to cede American territory is evident from the exchange of letters between Governor Edward Everett and Story set forth in Appendix A, infra.

See also Percheman v. United States, 32 U.S. (7 Pet.) 511 (1833), in which Marshall held that the Treaty with Spain of 1819 had of its own force confirmed the titles of pre-treaty owners of Florida land ceded to the United States by the Treaty; Percheman held that the interpretation of the 1918 Treaty approved in Foster v. Neilson, 27 U.S. (2 Pet.) 253 (1829) (a case relied on by Mr. Berger [Addendum to Statement, Part I]), was in error.

[6] 133 U.S. 258 (1890). Geofroy v. Riggs is a particularly strong illustration of the capacity of treaties to regulate matters delegated to Congress: That case applied a treaty to rights of inheritance in the District of Columbia, notwithstanding that Article I, § 8(17) confers on Congress the power of "exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever" relating to the District.

XII at 21 et seq. Set forth below, in Appendix A of this memorandum, is an exchange of letters between Story and Massachusetts Governor Edward Everett which evidences Story's and Marshall's shared recognition of the capacity of a treaty to effectuate a cession of territory. (For having drawn my attention to the Everett-Story exchange, I am particularly indebted to Professor Stefan A. Riesenfeld, currently Counsellor to the Legal Advisor of the Department of State).

[8] With all respect, I submit that the two Supreme Court cases relied on by Mr. Berger to support the asserted exclusivity of legislative (as opposed to treaty) power to dispose of American territory, in no way undercut the doctrines so plainly announced in Holden v. Joy, Jones v. Meehan, and Geofroy v. Riggs. (1) The Court's opinion in Sioux Tribe v. United States, 316 U.S. 317 (1942), does refer, at pp. 324 and 326, to the "exclusive" Congressional power to dispose of United States territory, but the question which the Court there answered in the negative was whether the President, acting solely on his own authority, could "convey to the Tribe the same kind of interest in the lands affected as it had acquired in the lands covered by the Fort Laramie Treaty. . . ." (Id. at 324) (emphasis added.) Thus, Sioux Tribe v. United States properly held presidential power over federal lands to be subordinate to Congressional power, and did so against an historical background clearly illustrating that treaties are as effective as statutes to transfer title to federal lands. (2) Wisconsin Central R.R. Co. v. Price County, 133 U.S. 496 (1890), also relied on by Mr. Berger, holds state authority over federal lands to be subordinate to Congressional authority: when one bears in mind that the opinion was published in the same volume of the United States Reports as Geofroy v. Riggs, and indeed was written by the same Justice (Justice Field), it is quite clear that the Court's insistence on the paramountcy of Congressional power was directed solely at the rival power before the Court—state power—and not at the concurrent treaty power, which is, like Congressional power, part of "the Supreme Law of the Land." Article VI, § 2.

[11] Mr. Berger's concerns about the aggrandizement of executive authority—concerns rooted in the traumas of Vietnam and Watergate—do not advance analysis of the scope of the treaty power. Treaties are made by the President, but subject to the consent of two-thirds of the Senate—hardly a recipe for unrestrained Presidential power. Arguably, such concerns are pertinent when a President proposes to take major international initiatives on his own account by executive agreement with a foreign power. Cf. 39 Op. Atty. Gen. 484 1941. They are not pertinent—indeed, they may properly be termed impertinent—when a President, acting in meticulous conformity with the procedures specified in the Constitution, has asked the Senate to fulfill the partnership role in the making of treaties which the Constitution expressly contemplates.

TAX CUTS, ANYONE?

Mr. GARN. Mr. President, for the last couple of years, Republicans have been urging significant tax cuts as a spur to the economy and a way to reduce massive budget deficits. Finally, President Carter has joined in the call for cuts, but with the object in view of increasing the budget deficit. Still in the thrall of a discredited Keynesianism, he remains convinced that transferring income from the productive sector of our economy to consumers will get us out of our present economic stagnation.

He is wrong.

Tax rates are too high, particularly at the top, where those whose efforts have been judged by the rest of us to be valuable reside. Increasing taxes on these productive individuals, and transferring their income to those less likely to produce, but certain to consume, can only aggravate an already troublesome inflation. The President's proposals will not produce more goods and services. How can they? Those who are most productive will find themselves penalized if they produce any more goods and services, and so naturally, they will not do it. Those less likely to produce will find themselves with more money to spend, so they will bid up prices on the reduced supply of goods and services. Anyone can see where that will lead.

The answer, of course, is an across-the-board tax cut, making everyone better off. It has been many years since incentives to production were increased, and it is about time that it is tried. It is exactly that approach that is advocated in the Roth-Kemp tax cut bill, which I have cosponsored. There are those who argue that passage of such a tax cut will increase the budget deficit, and that Federal spending should be reduced before such a cut is enacted. I am all for holding down Federal spending, but if we wait for that day to arrive, there will never be a tax cut. Besides, there is very good evidence that a tax cut will increase tax revenues, not lower them, and lower the budget deficit.

In an article in the current issue of the Public Interest, Jude Wanniski discusses this phenomenon. Briefly stated, the thesis is that there are two tax rates that will produce the same amount of tax revenue. That this is true is easiest to see at tax rates of zero and 100 percent. In either case, tax revenue would be zero. If tax rates were 100 percent, revenues would be zero, and people would do everything for themselves. As tax rates are reduced from 100 percent, it becomes profitable to move into a money economy, and tax revenues increase.

I am not suggesting that tax rates today are 100 percent, but I do contend that they are high enough today to discourage economic efficiency, and that cutting taxes would permit increased efficiency and thus increased tax revenues. The Wanniski article is fascinating, and I commend it to the attention of every Senator before we consider the President's tax reform proposals later this year. I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TAXES REVENUES, AND THE "LAFFER CURVE"

(By Jude Wanniski)

(The diagram referred to in the following article is not reproducible in the RECORD.)

As Arthur Laffer has noted, "There are always two tax rates that yield the same revenues." When an aide to President Gerald Ford asked him once to elaborate, Laffer (who is Professor of Business Economics at the University of Southern California) drew a simple curve, shown on the next page, to illustrate his point. The point, too, is simple enough—though, like so many simple points, it is also powerful in its implications.

When the tax rate is 100 percent, all production ceases in the money economy (as distinct from the barter economy, which exists largely to escape taxation). People will not work in the money economy if all the fruits of their labors are confiscated by the government. And because production ceases, there is nothing for the 100-percent rate to confiscate, so government revenues are zero.

On the other hand, if the tax rate is zero, people can keep 100 percent of what they produce in the money economy. There is no governmental "wedge" between earnings and after-tax income, and thus no governmental barrier to production. Production is therefore maximized and the output of the money economy is limited only by the desire of workers for leisure. But because the tax rate is zero, government revenues are again zero, and there can be no government. So at a 0-percent tax rate the economy is in a state of anarchy, and at a 100-percent tax rate the economy is functioning entirely through barter.

In between lies the curve. If the government reduces its rate to something less than 100 percent, say to point A, some segment of the barter economy will be able to gain so many efficiencies by being in the money economy that, even with near-confiscatory tax rates, after-tax production would still exceed that of the barter economy. Production will start up, and revenues will flow into the government treasury. By lowering the tax rate, we find an increase in revenues.

On the bottom end of the curve, the same thing is happening. If people feel that they need a minimal government and thus institute a low tax rate, some segment of the economy, finding that the marginal loss of income exceeds the efficiencies gained in the money economy, is shifted into barter or leisure. But with that tax rate, revenues do flow into the government treasury. This is the situation at point B. Point A represents a very high tax rate and very low production. Point B represents a very low tax rate and very high production. Yet they both yield the same revenue to the government.

The same is true of points C and D. The government finds that by a further lowering of the tax rate, say from point A to point C, revenues increase with the further expansion of output. And by raising tax rate, say from point B to point D, revenues also increase, by the same amount.

Revenues and production are maximized at point E. If, at point E, the government lowers the tax rate again, output will increase, but revenues will fall. And if, at point E, the tax rate is raised, both output and revenue will decline. The shaded area is the prohibitive range for government, where rates are unnecessarily high and can be reduced with gains in both output and revenue.

TAX RATES AND TAX REVENUES

The next important thing to observe is that, except for the 0-percent and 100-percent rates, there are no numbers along the "laffer curve." Point E is not 50 percent, although it may be, but rather a variable number: It is the point at which the electorate desires to be taxed. At points B and D, the electorate desires more government goods and services and is willing—without reducing its productivity—to pay the higher rates consistent with the revenues at point E. And at points A and C, the electorate desires more private goods and services in the money economy, and wishes to pay the lower rates consistent with the revenues at point E. It is the task of the statesman to determine the location of point E, and follow its variations as closely as possible.

This is true whether the political leader heads a nation or a family. The family who disciplines his son at point A, imposing harsh penalties for violating both major and minor rules, only invites sullen rebellion, stealth, and lying (tax evasion, on the national level). The permissive father who disciplines casually at point B invites open, reckless rebellion: His son's independence and relatively unfettered growth comes at the expense of the rest of the family. The wise parent seeks point E, which will probably vary from one child to another, from son to daughter.

For the political leader on the national level, point E can represent a very low or a very high number. When the nation is at war, point E can approach 100 percent. At the siege of Leningrad in World War II, for example, the people of the city produced for 900 days at tax rates approaching 100 percent. Russian soldiers and civilians worked to their physical limits, receiving as "pay" only the barest of rations. Had the citizens of Leningrad not wished to be taxed at that high rate, which was required to hold off the Nazi army, the city would have fallen.

The number represented by point E will change abruptly if the nation is at war one day and at peace the next. The electorate's demand for military goods and services from the government will fall sharply; the electorate will therefore desire to be taxed at a lower rate. If rates are not lowered consistent with this new lower level of demand, output will fall to some level consistent with a point along the prohibitive side of the "Laffer curve." Following World War I, for example, the wartime tax rates were left in place and greatly contributed to the recession of 1919–20. Warren G. Harding ran for President in 1920 on a slogan promising a "return to normalcy" regarding tax rates; he was elected in a landslide. The subsequent rolling back of the rates ushered in the economic expansion of the "Roaring Twenties." After World War II, wartime tax rates were quickly reduced, and the American economy enjoyed a smooth transition to peacetime. In Japan and West Germany, however, there was no adjustment of the rates; as a result, postwar economic recovery was delayed. Germany's recovery began in 1948, when personal income-tax rates were reduced under Finance Minister Ludwig Erhard, and much of the government regulation of commerce came to and end. Japan's recovery did not begin until 1950, when wartime tax rates were finally rolled back. In each case, reduced rates produced increased revenues for the government. The political leader must fully appreciate the distinction between tax rates and tax revenues to discern the desires of the electorate.

The easiest way for a political leader to determine whether an increase in rates will produce more rather than less revenues is to put the proposition to the electorate. It is not enough for the politician to propose an increase from, say, point B to point D on the curve. He must also specify how the anticipated revenues will be spent. When voters approve a bond issue for schools, highways, or bridges, they are explicitly telling the politician that they are willing to pay the high tax rates required to finance the bonds. In rejecting a bond issue, however, the electorate is not necessarily telling the politician that taxes are already high enough, or that point E (or beyond) has been reached. The only message is that the proposed tax rates are too high a price to pay for the specific goods and services offered by the government.

Only a tiny fraction of all government expenditures are determined in this fashion, to be sure. Most judgments regarding tax rates and expenditures are made by individual politicians. Andrew Mellon became a national hero for engineering the rate reductions of the 1920's, and was called "the greatest Treasury Secretary since Alexander Hamilton." The financial policies of Ludwig Erhard were responsible for what was hailed as "an economic miracle"—the postwar recovery of Germany. Throughout history, however, it has been the exception rather than the rule that politicians, by accident or design, have sought to increase revenues by lowering rates.

WORK VS. PRODUCTIVITY

The idea behind the "Laffer curve" is no doubt as old as civilization, but unfortunately politicians have always had trouble grasping it. In his essay, "Of Taxes," written in 1756, David Hume pondered the problem:

"Exorbitant taxes, like extreme necessity, destroy industry by producing despair; and even before they reach this pitch, they raise the wages of the labourer and manufacturer, and heighten the price of all commodities. An attentive disinterested legislature will observe the point when the emolument ceases, and the prejudice begins. But as the contrary character is much more common, 'tis to be feared that taxes all over Europe are multiplying to such a degree as will entirely crush all art and industry; tho' perhaps, their first increase, together with other circumstances, might have contributed to the growth of these advantages."

The chief reason politicians and economists throughout history have failed to grasp the idea behind the "Laffer curve" is their confusion of work and productivity. Through both introspection and observation, the politician understands that when tax rates are raised, there is a tendency to work harder and longer to maintain after-tax income. What is not so apparent, because it requires analysis at the margin, is this: As taxes are raised, individuals in the system may indeed work harder, but their productivity declines. Hume himself had some trouble with this point:

"There is a prevailing maxim, among some reasoners, that every new tax creates a new ability in the subject to bear it, and that each increase of public burdens increases proportionably the industry of the people. This maxim is of such a nature as is most likely to be abused; and is so much the more dangerous as its truth cannot be altogether denied: But it must be owned, when kept within certain bounds, to have some foundation in reason and experience."

Twenty years later, in "The Wealth of Nations," Adam Smith had no such problem: In his hypothetical pin factory, what is important to a nation is not the effort of individuals but the productivity of individuals working together. When the tax rates are raised, the workers themselves may work harder in an effort to maintain their income level. But if the pin-making entrepreneur is a marginal manufacturer, the increased tax rate will cause him to shift into the leisure sphere or into a lower level of economic activity, and the system will lose all the production of the pin factory. The politician who stands in the midst of this situation may correctly conclude that the increase in tax rates cause people to work harder. But it is not so easy for him to realize that they are now less efficient in their work and are producing less.

To see this in another way, imagine that there are three men who are skilled at building houses. If they work together, one works on the foundation, one on the frame, and the third on the roof. Together they can build three houses in three months. If they work separately, each building his own home, they need six months to build the three houses. If the tax rate on homebuilding is 49 percent, they will work together, since the government leaves them a small gain from their division of labor. But if the tax rate goes to 51 percent, they suffer a net loss because of their teamwork, and so they will work separately. When they were pooling their efforts, since they could produce six houses in the same time it would take them to build three houses working alone, the government was collecting revenues almost equivalent to the value of three completed homes. At the 51-percent tax rate, however, the government loses all the revenue, and the economy loses the production of the three extra homes that could have been built by their joint effort.

The worst mistakes in history are made by political leaders who, instead of realizing that revenues could be gained by lowering tax rates, become alarmed at the fall in revenues that results when citizens seek to escape high tax rates through barter and do-it-yourself labor. Their impulse is to impose taxes that cannot be escaped, the most onerous of which is a poll tax or head tax, which must be paid annually for the mere privilege of living. Hume had no difficulty in pointing out the fallacy of that line of thinking:

"Historians inform us that one of the chief causes of the destruction of the Roman state was the alteration which Constantine introduced into the finances, by substituting a universal poll tax in lieu of almost all the tithes, customs, and excises which formerly composed the revenue of the empire. The people, in all the provinces, were so grinded and oppressed by the publicans [tax collectors] that they were glad to take refuge under the conquering arms of the barbarians, whose dominion, as they had fewer necessities and less art, was found preferable to the refined tyranny of the Romans."

The trouble with a poll tax, as Hume noted, is that it can be escaped—one method being not to defend your country against an aggressor who promises to remove the tax as soon as he has gained power. Montesquieu made a similar observation in Book XIII of "The Spirit of the Laws:"

"Because a moderate government has been productive of admirable effects, this moderation has been laid aside; because great taxes have been raised, they wanted to carry them to excess; and ungrateful to the hand of liberty, of whom they received this present, they addressed themselves to slavery, who never grants the least favor.

"Liberty produces excessive taxes; the effect of excessive taxes is slavery; and slavery produces diminution of tribute. . . .

"It was this excess of taxes that occasioned the prodigious facility with which the Mohammedans carried on their conquests. Instead of a continual series of extortions devised by the subtle avarices of the Greek emperors, the people were subjected to a simple tribute which was paid and collected with ease. Thus they were far happier in obeying a barbarous nation than a corrupt government, in which they suffered every inconvenience of lost liberty, with all the horror of present slavery."

Modern governments have at least abandoned the notion of using a poll tax to generate revenues. Instead, they often go directly to the barter economy in search of revenues. Activities previously not admitted to the money economy and public marketplace because of public disapproval—e.g., gambling and pornography—are welcomed because of the promise of revenues. But this process tends to lower the quality of the marketplace itself, hastening the exodus or discouraging the entry of enterprises that have earned public approbation.

"CRACKING DOWN"

Another timeless remedy of governments that find revenues falling in the face of rising tax rates is to increase the numbers and powers of the tax collectors. Invariably, this method further reduces the flow of revenues to the treasury. Yet even with a thousand-year history of failure, the policy of "cracking down" on tax evasion remains a favorite of modern governments. Here is Adam Smith, in "The Wealth of Nations," on why such policies are doomed from the start:

"Every tax ought to be so contrived as both to take out and to keep out of the pockets of the people as little as possible, over and above what it brings into the public treasury of the state. A tax may either take out or keep out of the pockets of the people a great deal more than it brings into the public treasury in the four following ways.

"First, the levying of it may require a great number of officers, whose salaries may eat up the greater part of the produce of the tax, and whose perquisites may impose another additional tax upon the people.

"Secondly, it may obstruct the industry of the people, and discourage them from applying to certain branches of business which might give maintenance and employment to great multitudes. While it obliges the people to pay, it may thus diminish, or perhaps destroy, some of the funds which might enable them to do so.

"Thirdly, by the forfeitures and other penalties which these unfortunate individuals incur who attempt unsuccessfully to evade the tax, it may frequently ruin them, and thereby put an end to the benefit which the community might have received from the employment of their capitals. An injudicious tax offers a great temptation to smuggling. But the penalties of smuggling must rise in proportion to the temptation. The law, contrary to all the ordinary principles of justice, first creates the temptation, and then punishes those who yield to it; and it commonly enhances the punishment too in proportion to the very circumstances which ought certainly to alleviate it, the temptation to commit the crime.

"Fourthly, by subjecting the people to the frequent visits and odious examination of the tax-gatherers, it may expose them to much unnecessary trouble, vexation, and oppression; and though vexation is not, strictly speaking, expense, it is certainly equivalent to the expense at which every man would be willing to redeem himself from it."

Adam Smith's point about smuggling may now seem obscure. After all, smuggling was something that went on in the 18th century, wasn't it? Consider the following excerpts from a recent editorial in The Wall Street Journal, which urged New York State and New York City to reduce their combined cigarette tax from 26¢ to 10¢ a pack:

"Through our browsings in the United States Tobacco Journal we have learned of estimates that half the cigarettes smoked in New York City are smuggled in from North Carolina, where the tax is 2¢ a pack. State Senator Roy M. Goodman, a Manhattan Republican, says the state and city are losing $93 million a year in this fashion. The smugglers load 40-foot trailers with 60,000 cartons purchased legally at $2.40 each and peddle them in the city via the organized crime network for $3.75, which is $1.25 or more below legitimate retail.

"Mr. Goodman recommends a one-year suspension of the city's 8¢-a-pack tax in order to break up the smuggling, plus an increase in the state enforcement field staff to 250 from the current 50, plus five years in jail for anyone caught smuggling 20,000 cartons or more. Last year only nine smugglers were jailed, each for a few months, with the common penalty $10 or $15.

"If Mr. Goodman's solution were adopted, at the end of the year the smugglers would be back, and the state would have a bigger bureaucracy. More smugglers would be caught, more judges and bailiffs and clerks would have to be hired, more jails would have to be built and more jailers hired. The wives and children of the jailed smugglers would go on welfare.

"Cutting the tax to 10¢ avoids all that. It immediately becomes uneconomic to smuggle. The enforcement staff of 50 can be assigned to more useful work, the state saving $1 million on that count alone. The courts would be less clogged with agents and smugglers, and the taxpayers would save court costs, as well as the costs of confining convicted smugglers and caring for their families.

"The state and city would appear to face a loss of $50 million or $60 million in revenues, but of course smokers would now buy their cigarettes through legitimate channels and the 10¢ a pack would yield about as much in revenue as 26¢ a pack yields now. But that's not all. Legitimate dealers would double their cigarette sales, earning higher business profits and personal income that the city and state then taxes.

"And don't forget the impact on the millions of cigarette smokers who would save 16¢ a pack. At a pack a day, that's $58.40 per year. At average marginal tax rates, a smoker has to earn more than $80 before Federal, state, and city taxes are deducted to get that amount. He can thus maintain his or her standard of living on $80 less in gross wage demands per year, which means it becomes economic for the marginal employer to do business in New York, increasing the number of jobs of all varieties and reducing cost and tax pressure on social services.

"Among other benefits, the industrious smugglers would have to find legitimate employment. It might be argued that they would be thrown on the welfare rolls. But if we know New York City, they are already on the welfare rolls, and would be forced to get off once they have visible jobs."

The Finance Office of New York City, unwilling to take the advice of either Adam Smith or The Wall Street Journal, simply rejected the idea that lowering rates would produce expanded revenues. But Adam Smith's advice was not even taken in England at the time he tendered it. The theory was not tested until 1827, and then only by accident, by an Act of Parliament. Oddly enough, the incident in question involved tobacco smuggling. Stephen Dowell gives the following account in "A History of Taxation and Taxes in England."

"The consumption of tobacco had failed to increase in proportion to the increase in the population. A curious circumstance had happened as regards the duty on tobacco. In effecting the statutory rearrangement of the duties in the previous year, the draughtsman of the Bill in error, allowed one fourth of the duty to lapse * * * he had accomplished a master stroke, for his reduction in the duty was followed by a decrease in smuggling so considerable as to induce [Chancellor of the Exchequer] Robinson to allow his [budget] surplus estimated at about £700,000, to go to continue the reduction thus unconsciously effected."

The Politburo of the Soviet Union has the same problem as the Finance Office of New York City: It also rejects the idea behind the "Laffer curve." The greatest burden to Soviet economic development is Soviet agriculture. Roughly 34.3 million Soviet citizens, out of a total population of 250 million, are engaged in producing food for the nation—and there is never enough. The United States, by contrast, employs only 4.3 million workers in food production, out of a total population of 200 million, generating an annual surplus for export equivalent to one-fourth the entire Soviet output. The drain on the Soviet economy is not only the low productivity of the farm sector. Because there are always shortages, and the state puts farm goods on the market at regulated prices rather than using the market system to allocate what is available, Soviet citizens spend billions of hours annually waiting on lines. If food were produced in plentiful quantities, it could still be allocated through regulated prices in conformance with Soviet ideology, but most of the lines would disappear, and the talents and energies of the urban work force would not be wasted in long lines.

The real source of this problem is the high marginal tax rates exacted on the state's collective farms. The state provides land, capital, housing, and other necessities on its collectives. It also permits the workers to keep 10 percent of the value of their production. The marginal tax rate is thus 90 percent. In agriculture, a small expenditure of effort might yield, say, 100 units of production; but twice the effort might be required for 150 units, and four times the effort for 200 units. The worker on the collective thus faces a progressive tax schedule so withering that any incentive to expend anything beyond a minimal effort is lost. With minimum work, he gets land, capital, housing, and other necessities, as well as 10 units of output. By quadrupling his effort (not necessarily physical effort, but perhaps increased attentiveness to details), he gets the same services and only 10 more units of output.

Meanwhile, however, the peasants on the collective farms are also permitted to tend private plots, the entire output of which is theirs to keep. The tax rate on these private plots is zero. Here is the result, as detailed by Hedrick Smith in "The Russians":

"Twenty-seven percent of the total value of Soviet farm output—about $32.5 billion worth a year—comes from private plots that occupy less than 1 percent of the nation's agricultural lands (about 26 million acres). At that rate, private plots are roughly 40 times as efficient as the land worked collectively. . . . Peasants farm their own plots much more intensively than they do collective land.

"Ultimately, the Communist ideal is to have this last embarrassing but necessary vestige of private enterprise wither away as industrialized state farming grows in scale and output. Nikita Khrushchev, in spite of rural roots, pursued that end vigorously and earned the enmity of the peasantry. He cut the size of private plots to a maximum of half an acre and made life difficult for the farm market trade. I was told by Russian friends that Ukrainian peasants became so irate that they stopped selling eggs as food and made paint out of them.

"Under Brezhnev things have improved. The maximum plot went back up to an acre and measures were taken to improve farm market operations. Soviet figures show the private farm output grew nearly 15 percent from 1966 to 1973."

In terms of the "Laffer curve," what Khrushchev did by reducing the size of the private plots from one acre to one-half acre was to increase the marginal tax of the system from point C to point A. This was undoubtedly a major cause of his political downfall. On the other hand, Brezhnev moved the marginal tax rate of the system back to point C, increasing output and revenues to the previous levels. This was an "economic miracle" of minor dimensions, but it has undoubtedly contributed heavily to Brezhnev's durability as a political leader.

THE POLITICS OF THE "LAFFER CURVE"

The "Laffer curve" is a simple but exceedingly powerful analytical tool. In one way or another, all transactions, even the simplest, take place along it. The homely adage, "You can catch more flies with molasses than with vinegar," expresses the essence of the curve. But empires are built on the bottom of this simple curve and crushed against the top of it. The Caesars understood this, and so did Napoleon (up to a point) and the greatest of the Chinese emperors. The Founding Fathers of the United States knew it well; the arguments for union (in The Federalist Papers) made by Hamilton, Madison, and Jay reveal an understanding of the notion. Until World War I—when progressive taxation was sharply increased to help finance it—the United States successfully remained out of the "prohibitive range."

In the 20th century, especially since World War I, there has been a constant struggle by all the nations of the world to get down the curve. The United States managed to do so in the 1920's, because Andrew Mellon understood the lessons of the "Laffer curve" for the domestic economy. Mellon argued that there are always two prices in the private market that will produce the same revenues. Henry Ford, for example, could get the same revenue by selling a few cars for $100,000 each, or a great number for $1,000 each. (Of course, Ford was forced by the threat of competition to sell at the low price.) The tax rate, said Mellon, is the "price of government." But the nature of government is monopolistic; government itself must find the lowest rate that yields the desired revenue.

Because Mellon was successful in persuading Republican Presidents—first Warren G. Harding and then Calvin Coolidge—of the truth of his ideas the high wartime tax rates were steadily cut back. The excess-profits tax on industry was repealed, and the 77-percent rate on the highest bracket of personal income was rolled back in stages, so that by 1925 it stood at 25 percent. As a result, the period 1921–29 was one of phenomenal economic expansion; G.N.P. grew from $89.6 billion to $103.1 billion. And because prices fell during this period, G.N.P. grew even faster in real terms, by 54 percent. At the lower rates, revenues grew sufficiently to enable Mellon to reduce the national debt from $24.3 billion to $16.9 billion.

The stock market crash of 1929 and the subsequent global depression occurred because Herbert Hoover unwittingly contracted the world economy with his high-tariff policies, which pushed the West, as an economic unit, up the "Laffer curve." Hoover compounded the problem in 1932 by raising personal tax rates almost up to the levels of 1920.

The most important economic event following World War II was also the work of a finance minister who implicitly understood the importance of the "Laffer curve." Germany had been pinned to the uppermost ranges of the curve since World War I. It took a financial panic in the spring of 1948 to shake Germany loose. At that point, German citizens were still paying a 50-percent marginal tax rate on incomes of $600 and a 95-percent rate on incomes above $15,000. On June 22, 1948, Finance Minister Ludwig Erhard announced cuts that raised the 50-percent bracket to $2,200 and the 95-percent bracket to $63,000. The financial panic ended, and economic expansion began. It was Erhard, not the Marshall Plan, who saved Europe from Communist encroachment. In the decade that followed, Erhard again and again slashed the tax rates, bringing the German economy farther down the curve and into a higher level of prosperity. In 1951 the 50-percent bracket was pushed up to $5,000 and in 1953 to $9,000, while at the same time the rate for the top bracket was reduced to 82 percent. In 1954, the rate for the top bracket was reduced again, to 80 percent, and in 1955 it was pulled down sharply, to 63 percent on incomes above $250,000; the 50-percent bracket was pushed up to $42,000. Yet another tax reform took place in 1958: The government exempted the first $400 of income and brought the rate for the top bracket down to 53 percent. It was this systematic lowering of unnecessarily high tax rates that produced the German "economic miracle." As national income rose in Germany throughout the 1950's, so did revenues, enabling the government to construct its "welfare state" as well as its powerful national defense system.

The British empire was built on the lower end of the "Laffer curve" and dismantled on the upper end. The high wartime rates imposed to finance the Napoleonic wars were cut back sharply in 1816, despite warnings from "fiscal experts" that the high rates were needed to reduce the enormous public debt of £900 million. For the following 60 years, the British economy grew at an unprecedented pace, as a series of finance ministers used ever-expanding reveneus to lower steadily the tax rates and tariffs.

In Britain, though, unlike the United States, there was no Mellon to risk lowering the extremely high tax rates imposed to finance World War I. As a result, the British economy struggled through the 1920's and 1930's. After World War II, the British government again made the mistake of not sufficiently lowering tax rates to spur individual initiative. Instead, the postwar Labour government concentrated on using tax policy for Keynesian objectives—i.e., increasing consumer demand to expand output. On October 23, 1945, tax rates were cut on lower-income brackets and surtaxes were added to the already high rates on the upper-income brackets. Taxes on higher incomes were increased, according to Chancellor of the Exchequer Hugh Dalton, in order to "continue that steady advance toward economic and social equality which we have made during the war and which the Government firmly intends to continue in peace."

From that day in 1945, there has been no concerted political voice in Britain arguing for a reduction of the high tax rates. Conservatives have supported and won tax reductions for business, especially investment-tax income credits. But while arguing for a reduction of the 83-percent rate on incomes above £20,000 (roughly $35,000 at current exchange rates) of earned income and the 98-percent rate on "unearned income" from investments, they have insisted that government first lower its spending, in order to permit the rate reductions. Somehow, the spending levels never can be cut. Only in the last several months of 1977 has Margaret Thatcher, the leader of the opposition Conservative Party, spoken of reducing the high tax rates as a way of expanding revenues.

In the United States, in September 1977, the Republican National Committee unanimously endorsed the plan of Representative Jack Kemp of New York for cutting tax rates as a way of expanding revenues through increased business activity. This was the first time since 1953 that the GOP had embraced the concept of tax cuts! In contrast, the Democrats under President Kennedy sharply cut tax rates in 1962–64 (though making their case in Keynesian terms). The reductions successfully moved the United States economy down the "Laffer curve," expanding the economy and revenues.

It is crucial to Western economic expansion, peace, and prosperity that "conservative" parties move in this direction. They are, after all, traditionally in favor of income growth, with "liberals" providing the necessary political push for income redistribution. A welfare state is perfectly consistent with the "Laffer curve," and can function successfully along its lower range. But there must be income before there can be income redistribution. Most of the economic failures of this century can rightly be charged to the failure of conservatives to press for tax rates along the lower range of the "Laffer curve." Presidents Eisenhower, Nixon and Ford were timid in this crucial area of public policy. The Goldwater Republicans of 1963–64, in fact, emphatically opposed the Kennedy tax-rate cuts!

If, during the remainder of this decade, the United States and Great Britain demonstrate the power of the "Laffer curve" as an analytical tool, its use will spread, in the developing countries as well as the developed world. Politicians who understand the curve will find that they can defeat politicians who do not, other things being equal. Electorates all over the world always know when they are unnecessarily perched along the upper edge of the "Laffer curve," and will support political leaders who can bring them back down.

SCHWEPPES USA, LTD., CELEBRATES 25TH ANNIVERSARY

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, this is the 25th Anniversary of Schweppes, USA, Ltd., which has its headquarters in Stamford, Conn. This enterprise is an important firm in my State of Connecticut.

I would like to take the occasion of this anniversary commemoration to report on the history on Schweppes USA, Ltd.

Schweppes USA Ltd. is a unit of Cadbury Schweppes Limited, London, an international food and beverage organization with annual sales approaching $2 billion and approximately 45,000 employees worldwide.

With roots dating back to 1783, Schweppes is the world's oldest producer of carbonated beverages. It was founded by Jacob Schweppe, a Swiss who emigrated to England to establish a business for the production of carbonated water, using a principle uncovered about 20 years earlier by British scientist Joseph Priestly.

Bottled soda water initially was classified as a patent medicine by the British Government, which ascribed to it the medicinal quality of naturally carbonated mineral waters. But by the early 1800s people had begun to drink the sparkling beverage as a refreshment and it was not long before it was used as a mixer with wines and spirits. By 1824 Schweppes had three branches and was growing rapidly.

Schweppes is best known for its quinine-flavored tonic water, which was patented in 1858. Today, its principal products in this country also include bitter lemon, ginger ale, club soda and ginger beer.

While Schweppes tonic water was imported from England by affluent Americans as early as 1898, mass distribution of the brand was not begun in the United States until 1953. Schweppes discontinued shipping bottled beverages here and, instead, adopted a technique American companies had been using for years—supply the essence and have the beverage produced locally by authorized bottlers according to rigid specifications.

Currently some 100 independent bottlers produce and market Schweppes mixers in most major areas of the country. These firms also serve as authorized bottlers for Coca-Cola, Pepsi-Cola, 7-Up, and other soft drink companies.

Schweppes activities in the United States are under the direction of Robert E. Ix, of Greenwich, Conn., chairman and chief executive officer of the Cadbury Schweppes American Region, which also includes Canada and Latin America; and John B. Onthank, who lives in Wilton, Conn., the president of Schweppes USA Ltd.

Schweppes was one of the first beverage organizations to imprint its containers with a message urging consumers to dispose of them thoughtfully.

As Schweppes marks its 25th anniversary of partnership with its U.S. bottlers, I congratulate Schweppes USA Ltd. and its bottlers, and wish them continued good fortune.

TRIBUTE TO AMBASSADOR WOODCOCK

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, during my recent trip to China I had the great pleasure to see once again Leonard Woodcock, who is now the chief of the U.S. Liaison Office in Peking. I was greatly impressed with the quiet and effective way in which Ambassador Woodcock is pursuing our Nation's interests in the People's Republic of China. We are fortunate indeed in having him as our representative as we move toward normalizing our relations with this key country in East Asia and the world.

Leonard has long been a good friend and adviser to my family, and one of the key supporters of my brothers when they ran for President. I was therefore particularly pleased to read the thoughtful article on Ambassador Woodcock, by Jay Mathews in the Washington Post. Mr. Mathews rightly points out that Leonard has won the respect of the Chinese and the admiration of the American community in Peking. He has my respect and admiration—and I believe that of my colleagues in this body—as well.

I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Mathews' article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Jan. 26, 1978]

WOODCOCK'S MARKS HIGH AS AMERICA'S CHINA ENVOY—BLENDS HARD WORK AND QUIET INTELLECT TO BREAK DOWN STEREOTYPE OF BACK-SLAPPING LABOR BOSS

HONG KONG.—When Leonard Woodcock arrived in Peking last July, many wondered how the 66-year-old labor leader would adjust to a new—and very different—life as America's top diplomat in China.

Six months later, Woodcock—blending an odd mixture of persistence, warmth, shyness and intellectual energy—has won the respect of many Chinese and the admiration of the little Peking colony of American China-watchers.

What's more, the former president of the United Auto Workers—a man who spent his entire adult life in the American labor movement—seems to have adapted very well to life in Peking, an uncomfortably isolated city for foreigners.

"The whole cultural atmosphere is entirely different (from Detroit)," Woodcock said in a recent interview. "It is a closed society. But I do like the Chinese people, and in a very simple sense, I've come to enjoy my life in Peking."

Woodcock has often surprised people who expected a back-slapping archetype of an American labor leader.

At first, he seemed diffident, withdrawn and almost inarticulate. Then people realized he was actually pausing to think about what he wanted to say.

Other than some personal reading begun years ago during an intense rethinking of the Vietnam issue, Woodcock had little contact with this part of the world before coming to Peking. Since his appointment, however, he has really "done his homework," a young China expert in the U.S. liaison office in Peking said.

"Once we were talking about Outer Mongolia and he reminded us of an important little development several years back that all the rest of us had forgotten," the expert recalled.

In the land of the dictatorship of the proletariat, where the blue-collar worker is officially enshrined as the vanguard of Chinese society, is this prominent leader of the American Labor movement deluged with questions about his life's work?

No.

"There has been no interest at all in my former labor association," Woodcock said during an interview after a conference for U.S. ambassadors here.

Chinese trade unions are just recovering from a long political eclipse, and "although I've visited 10 plants, in only one instance was a person introduced to me as being part of the local trade union," Woodcock said.

A Peking vice mayor asked some questions about Detroit and the auto industry after Woodcock remarked on the efficiency of city services in Peking, but that was the only conversation with a Chinese touching on his former life that he can remember.

As for the shift from labor leader to diplomat, "There's a great deal of reading, which is not that much different, from negotiation reports to diplomatic cables.

"The official meetings are highly stylized in the sense that both sides are very careful how they put things," Woodcock said. "But when you get to the critical phase of collective bargaining, both sides also tend to be very careful what they say, and sometimes you have to listen very carefully for what is not said as well as what is said," something that China-watchers must do every day.

If anyone could ever be mistaken for a union leader, it would be Huang Chen, the outgoing, burly Chinese diplomat often with an arm around someone's shoulder who until late last year was Woodcock's opposite number, heading the Chinese liaison office in Washington.

Woodcock has Huang's warmth, but not his style. He never had to win an election of the UAW membership. He was picked by the unions' governing board after Walter Reuther died in an airplane crash.

Woodcock provides a nice counterpoint to the young, often frenetic U.S. staff in Peking. After years of language training and study of lengthy name lists the American analysts are deep into the subject of China, and in many cases have developed a wild sense of humor to compensate for the single-mindedness of their profession and the isolation of Peking.

Woodcock seems much calmer. He has learned to break away from the daily obsession with China-watching through long walks or cycle rides. He has been separated for many years from his wife, and lives alone in an apartment on the second floor of the large quarters set aside for the liaison office chief.

"I've managed to read more books during seven months in Peking than I did during seven years as president of the UAW," he said. Right now, he is reading "China and The Search for Human Happiness" by Wolfgang Bauer.

"One of the points Bauer makes is that because of Chinas' pictographic language, it was able readily to assimilate foreign influences." Woodcock said. "They had to be described in that language, and thus were changed." Three days a week a language instructor sent by the Chinese government arrives to give Woodcock his language lesson.

"The man told me once, I think he considered it a compliment, that it was remarkable that a man of my age could remember so well," Woodcock said. "I find that just when I think I've gotten beyond asking for a cup of coffee, I'm thrown for a 10-yard loss."

Woodcock was offered the Peking job in a phone call from President Carter last spring.

"I would not have accepted any ambassadorial post where there was no challenge, but I do think we have made so many mistakes in this part of the world that I wanted to be a small part of making things better," he said.

Woodcock had impressed Carter by leading a U.S. mission to Hanoi earlier in 1977 to open talks on normalizing relations with reunified Vietnam. As for China, "I feel strongly that we should over time normalize relations," Woodcock said. "I think if we had done it immediately after 1949, the history of this region would have been quite different."

In a methodical way that those who watched his labor career consider typical, Woodcock has gone about opening up new contacts with the Chinese, conferring with people like the head of the Central Bank and the Sports Minister whom his predecessor had not been able to see.

He misses his children, whom he once publicly credited with changing his mind about American involvement in the Vietnam War.

His elder daughter, Leslie, 33, who teaches labor history at the University of Michigan, has promised to visit Peking when the school year ends, along with her husband their daughter and twin sons. Woodcock's son, John, 25, has just started work in the engineering department of Chrysler Corp.

His younger daughter, Janet, 30, does drug rehabilitation work in Boston.

They had an election to choose a Santa Claus for the U.S. liaison office Christmas party, and Woodcock was a candidate. Everybody knew he loved children, but his quiet demeanor cost him votes. Somebody else got the job.

Nonetheless he recalled, a three-year-old girl he befriended at a reception months before "came up to me at the Christmas party and squeezed my leg." "I had won," Woodcock says.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR KENNEDY AT HIROSHIMA UNIVERSITY

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, no issue facing the Senate this year is more critical for the future well-being of the American people and indeed the people all over the world than the issue of nuclear proliferation.

The leadership has announced that as soon as action on the Criminal Code bill is completed, the Senate will take up S. 897, the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Act.

It is time for the U.S. Senate to take clearly needed legislative action to protect future generations from the scourge of nuclear war brought on by the proliferation of nuclear weapons. If we fail to take action—if we allow special interests to stand in the way of progress in this area through the blocking of passage of this moderate and sensible legislation—we will have abdicated our responsibilities to future generations. It is useful to be reminded of what failure to take action in this important area could mean. Anyone who has visited the cities of Hiroshima and Nagasaki, as I have, and has seen the effect of wartime destruction on people, as I have, has no difficulty dedicating himself to preventing the spread of nuclear weaponry.

Recently, the distinguished senior Senator from Massachusetts Senator EDWARD KENNEDY presented an address before the Japan-America Society at Hiroshima University dealing with various aspects of the problem of nuclear proliferation. Senator KENNEDY's thoughtful remarks are deserving of the attention of all those who are concerned with this most important problem of proliferation, and I ask unanimous consent that the full text of his address be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS BY SENATOR EDWARD M. KENNEDY AT HIROSHIMA

It is a great honor for me to speak here today, in Hiroshima a city which has experienced appalling destruction but also magnificient recovery.

It is impossible to visit Hiroshima without feeling a deep obligation to avoid the holocaust which twice visited Japan. In his novel, Black Rain, the great writer Masuji Ibuse characterized the nuclear explosion as:

"More like a jellyfish than a mushroom—writhing and raging as though it might hurl itself on our heads at any moment. It was an envoy of the devil itself, I decided: who else in the whole wide universe would have presumed to summon forth such a monstrosity?"

This city stands as more than a monument to massive death and destruction. It stands as a living testament to the necessity for progress toward nuclear disarmament—for preventing the spread of nuclear weapons and for progressively reducing their numbers in the few countries that have them today.

We must all rededicate ourselves to forestalling the destructive application of nuclear energy—not merely for reasons of strategy but for reasons of humanity. The nuclear arms race of the past 25 years is a tragic story of continuing folly in the face of the lessons of history.

To its historic credit, Japan has long been committed to the objective of eliminating nuclear weapons from this earth. It has set a leading example through its three non-nuclear principles and its commitment never again to become an offensive military power.

The world has but to learn from Japan's re-emergence as a power that expresses its greatness in economic and political rather than in military terms. Like many states, Japan is surrounded by heavily militarized neighbors. Yet, unlike most major nations, Japan has achieved its greatness without maintaining a large military establishment.

To be sure, this accomplishment has depended substantially on continued international stability, on both the strategic and conventional military levels. We enjoy a strategic balance between the United States and the Soviet Union. We enjoy a regional balance in Europe as well as in the Far East. The United States is committed to maintaining this balance on which peace continues to depend. We place a very high value on the U.S.-Japan Security Treaty which is the foundation of our policy in East Asia.

But stability cannot be an end in itself. It must be the context for moving to reduce military forces, nuclear and conventional. Thus I welcome the negotiation of a SALT II agreement arresting the strategic arms race, but I look forward even more to a SALT III agreement which will reverse this race.

At long last, the US, UK and USSR are completing negotiations on a comprehensive ban of all nuclear testing. For several years, I have sponsored a resolution in the Senate supporting a comprehensive test ban. Japan has long advocated such a ban. We both can look with satisfaction to the completion of the process that began with the limited nuclear test ban under President Kennedy.

I recognize that, at its outset, a comprehensive test ban may not attract the support of all the nuclear weapons states. Even so, it will be an important step forward, one which I believe most nations will accept immediately and which I hope all nations will accept eventually. For those who will not accept the comprehensive ban immediately, I hope that they will adhere to the limited test ban treaty, or at least decide unilaterally to abandon all nuclear explosions in the atmosphere.

Never again should black rain fall.

Unfortunately, neither limiting strategic arms nor banning nuclear tests will guarantee that we can reduce rather than increase the number of nuclear weapons in the world. Much more is needed to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons and nuclear explosive capabilities.

We were sharply reminded of this fact with the detonation of a nuclear device by India in 1974. This explosion dramatized the danger that nuclear energy developed for peaceful purposes could be diverted—unless it is properly controlled—to construct nuclear explosives.

At the same time, international demand for nuclear power has increased geometrically with the quadrupling of oil prices since the 1973 OPEC embargo. As nuclear facilities spread worldwide, the potential for nuclear catastrophe also increases. We are all aware of how these plants can endanger the environment, become targets for terrorists, and tempt a government to manufacture nuclear weapons.

This audience, in this place, understands well the dangers of nuclear proliferation.

Both of our countries depend too much on oil imports from OPEC countries. But Japan's dependence on outside energy sources is greater than any other industrialized country. If 22% of American energy needs are presently met by imported oil, 73% of Japanese needs depend on imported oil. So I am especially conscious of Japan's need for energy security.

It is in our strong national interest to reduce this unacceptable dependence on outside energy sources, as well as to reduce our overall energy consumption. We in the United States have a special obligation as the world's most conspicuous and wasteful consumers of fossil fuels.

It is clear, moreover, that advanced energy sources—such as solar, geothermal, wind and bio-conversion—will not provide adequate energy security for the remainder of this century. By the year 2000, even the most optimistic estimates are that these sources will provide only marginal amounts of energy.

We should do our utmost to develop these alternative sources. I welcome the bilateral efforts underway between Japanese government agencies and the American Department of Energy, and the multilateral efforts in the context of the international energy agency and the new international nuclear fuel cycle evaluation program. I believe they should be expanded as rapidly as possible, with more resources devoted to this task.

But the implacable reality remains: over the next few decades we have no acceptable alternative to increased reliance on nuclear energy. With the benefits that nuclear energy implies comes the dangers of nuclear proliferation and environmental damage that it entails. We are thus confronted potentially with a terrible dilemma between diminished energy security and increased nuclear insecurity.

Fortunately, it is possible to discern a reasonable way out of this dilemma, which responds to our essential energy needs as well as to the imperative to avoid nuclear catastrophe. To succeed, this way out must combine both technical and political constraints against nuclear proliferation.

Historically, the most important constraints have been the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT) and the nuclear safeguards system administered by the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), we are both members of the IAEA and parties to the NPT. Comprehensive and effective safeguards are indispensable to public confidence in and support for peaceful nuclear power—and rightly so. We must strive for maximum support for international safeguards and universal adherence to the NPT—which combines political commitments not to acquire or transfer nuclear explosives with acceptance of IAEA safeguards over all civil nuclear facilities in states party to the Treaty.

While important, these constraints are not sufficient. It would be an extremely serious act, but a sufficiently determined or desperate government could withdraw from the treaty and use its nuclear materials for weapons purposes. Subnational groups could seize nuclear explosive materials with the same purpose in mind.

These risks force all responsible people to focus on the nature of the nuclear facilities and nuclear materials themselves. To date, Japan and the United States have relied on conventional nuclear power reactors using low enriched uranium fuel. Neither the fuel nor the product of the reactors can be used directly to make nuclear bombs.

However, highly enriched uranium and plutonium can be used directly to make nuclear bombs. They can also be used as fuel for nuclear reactors, including the so-called breeder reactor which can regenerate the fuel it uses. There are no safeguards presently available which can detect diversion of these sensitive materials for nuclear weapons purposes in sufficient time for effective counter action by the international community.

This is why both Japan and the United States oppose the export of sensitive nuclear facilities, in contrast to the export of conventional nuclear reactors and fuel. This is why we have both deferred commercial reprocessing to produce plutonium—and undertaken to evaluate fuel cycle alternatives that can offer increased resistance to nuclear proliferation. This is also why we have both participated in the nuclear suppliers' group in London—to strengthen nuclear safeguards and controls and remove them from commercial competition. And this underscores why we have both engaged in the international nuclear fuel cycle evaluation—to make the next generation of nuclear technology at least as safe as the existing generation.

It is clear, then, that neither of our countries supports the spread of nuclear weapons materials or the sensitive plants which produce them. Both of our countries support strong nuclear controls in the context of the IAEA and the NPT. I welcome this, and I believe that our cooperation in the non-proliferation field will be of great significance both globally and in East Asia.

Still facing Japan and the United States is an extremely serious issue of the direction of our domestic nuclear energy policies. If we decide to use sensitive nuclear materials, particularly plutonium, for commercial purposes, then I fear that other countries will follow suit. The resulting damage of our non-proliferation efforts could be great, even irreparable.

Last July several of my Senate colleagues and I opposed the operation of an American reprocessing plant in Barnwell, South Carolina, to produce plutonium. The Administration has decided to exclude producing plutonium at Barnwell, using it instead to develop more proliferation-proof technologies. Plutonium is not only highly explosive but is also one of the most toxic materials known to man. I am persuaded that there is ample uranium for existing and projected nuclear power reactors into the next century. We should make concerted efforts to identify and exploit uranium resources around the world. We always have the possibility of producing the plutonium at a later time—if it is safe to do so and if uranium becomes uneconomic as a fuel.

Most importantly, my colleagues and I feel that commercial production of plutonium would be an extremely bad example to set. Taiwan and South Korea have decided not to produce or use plutonium. They deserve credit for agreeing not to do so.

We are hopeful that other countries will abstain from developing a plutonium economy as well, as long as we lack adequate protection against diversion or withdrawal from safeguards. For them to acquire plutonium or the capability to produce it is for them to be one critical step closer to a nuclear weapons capability.

None of this is to deny the possibility of using plutonium in nuclear breeder reactors if and when we do develop adequate protection. During the current fiscal year, the Carter Administration is spending up to $483 million on breeder research and development, with special attention to new safeguards approaches. I support this expenditure as much as I do the decisions by President Ford and Carter to defer the commercialization of reprocessing and plutonium use in the United States.

Of course, the Tokai reprocessing facility presents a nuclear problem for Japan as well as for my country. Tokai would produce plutonium from uranium supplied by the United States. I welcome the interim approach we both reached last September on Tokai, which protected Japan's long term nuclear energy programs at the same time as it recognized the "serious proliferation danger" of plutonium and the need to avoid its premature commercialization.

This agreement now makes it possible for us to investigate objectively, over the next two years, the crucial issues of uranium availability and the control of the next generation of nuclear technology. We must use this time wisely, to develop new approaches to nuclear energy while reducing the nuclear hazards which have dogged us for the past three decades.

Many of the solutions can and should be developed in the context of the international nuclear fuel cycle evaluation, with the participation of both nuclear suppliers and nuclear consumers. I strongly believe that the United States and Japan should take the lead in achieving these solutions and in preventing the supplier/consumer divisions which have bedevilled international economic, including energy, negotiations in other areas. The key factors will be the example we ourselves set and our readiness to adopt a non-discriminatory approach to the peaceful uses of nuclear energy. In short, if we commercialize plutonium, it would be hypocritical to ask others not to.

Perhaps the most promising solutions will be in the fields of nuclear fuel supply and nuclear waste management. If these are addressed successfully, pressures for preprocessing and plutonium use can be sharply reduced.

I see great merit in proposals for an international nuclear fuel bank. Such a bank would enable the international community to "pool" uranium fuel, assuring ample, reliable and economic supply in return for effective safeguards and controls. I propose that our two countries consider together establishment of long-term fuel reserves, possibly through joint investment in uranium enrichment facilities which would contribute to such reserves. The objective would be to assure an attractive and stable international market for nuclear fuels, based on effective international safeguards and controls.

I also believe it is crucial to develop safe and ample international facilities for storing spent nuclear fuel, which can be retrieved if and when plutonium can be safely produced and used. Not only could such facilities eliminate the frequent argument that inadequate storage capacity forces reprocessing, even if the resulting plutonium is recognized to be unsafe, they would also prove to be less costly and dangerous under existing conditions. I propose that the United States and Japan establish a spent fuel storage center, possibly on territory owned by the US Government in the Pacific. This center would reduce pressures on Japanese storage facilities and would be open also to other nuclear consumers on the same non-proliferation terms as the uranium fuel reserves.

I see great hope for bold, imaginative, intensive cooperation between our two countries—cooperation which will meet our energy needs while reducing the dangers of nuclear proliferation. This cooperation would befit the increasingly close and varied relationship between our democratic, industrialized societies. It would take place in the multilateral supplier-consumer context of the international nuclear fuel cycle evaluation. This cooperation would accord with the profound non-nuclear tradition of Japan, with Japan's leading role in the field of nuclear disarmament.

We are now at a crucial stage, almost as crucial as the cold dawn of the nuclear era. We have learned how to control—effectively and safely—the first generation of nuclear reactors and nuclear fuel. Despite some follies in the atoms for peace period, we successfully established an unprecedented international safeguards system integrally tied to the IAEA and eventually the Non-Proliferation Treaty. International consensus on non-proliferation must be reinforced by elimination of nuclear tests, reaction of nuclear armaments and a general devaluation of the role of nuclear weapons in world politics.

We are now confronted with the spread of nuclear technology to other, less stable regions of the world. Nuclear controls must become even more effective, and must remain as non-discriminatory as possible in the peaceful, nuclear field.

We are confronted as well with increased pressures to move to a second, self-sustaining generation of nuclear technology in which the centerpiece is the breeder reactor. We must not enter it prematurely. We must recognize our obligation to protect our societies at least as well from the dangers of this second generation as from the first. At the same time, we can and should increase our energy security through assured supply of non-sensitive nuclear reactors and fuel under effective safeguards, and through active breeder research and development.

At the conclusion of "Black Rain", Shigematsu prophesized that "If a rainbow appears over those hills now, a miracle will happen. Let a rainbow appear—not a white one, but one of many hues—and Yasuko will be cured." He knew the miracle would never come true, but he kept his eyes on the nearby hills.

Let us keep our eyes on the nearby hills and work increasingly toward ridding this earth of the scourge of nuclear weapons. That miracle may never happen. But we will have justified all the painstaking efforts if we make our lives—and those of generations to come—even slightly more secure.

NOTICE CONCERNING NOMINATION BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, the following nomination has been referred to and is now pending before the Committee on the Judiciary:

John P. Volz, of Louisiana, to be U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Louisiana for the term of 4 years vice Gerald J. Gallinghouse.

On behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary, notice is hereby given to all persons interested in this nomination to file with the committee, in writing, on or before Monday, February 6, 1978, any representations or objections they may wish to present concerning the above nomination with a further statement whether it is their intention to appear at any hearing which may be scheduled.

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, after years of neglect and inattention, American education badly needs solid, effective Federal guidance, and assistance.

For that reason, I am personally pleased with President Carter's leadership in the field of education. In his state of the Union address on January 19, the President said it is "time to take a major step by creating a separate Department of Education."

The Committee on Governmental Affairs will soon resume hearings on legislation to create a separate, Cabinet-level Department of Education. Senate bill 991, now before the committee, has 55 cosponsors.

We welcome the President's strong commitment to the establishment of an Education Department. It is my hope that Congress will move swiftly and judiciously on the legislation. The need for strong Federal leadership has never been greater.

Mr. President, syndicated columnist, Tom Braden, recently wrote about the need for a Department of Education. I ask unanimous consent that his column be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

VOTING "YES" ON EDUCATION

(By Tom Braden)

I don't suppose the country will suffer rapid decline if Jimmy Carter doesn't win Cabinet-level status for a new Department of Education. But it does seem to me that this is a sound organizational move, and that it ought to have been taken long ago.

The fact that the President is fulfilling a campaign promise that he made to the nation's teachers seems to be irrelevant. Why shouldn't he make promises to the nation's teachers? There are about 3 million of them; and if our citizenry were categorized on a scale of "goodness," teachers would rank pretty high.

Moreover, it seems to me that the enormous constituency that is engaged in getting educated has long been neglected. We have a Department of Agriculture to advise a dwindling number of farmers; we have a Department of Labor that exists largely to help trade unionists; we have a Department of Commerce to offer aid to businessmen. Why shouldn't we have a department to guide, encourage and advise the more than 50 million of our population who are going to school?

It is at least arguable that, as a function of government, education is more important than some other functions that now rate Cabinet status. Our future and our hopes for high achievement rest on education.

Right now the federal government is spending about $30 billion a year on education, and the programs are scattered all over the place. About half of them are in the Department of Health, Education and Welfare and the rest are controlled by 20 other departments, agencies and bureaus, often necessitating long negotiation between rival empires to get anything done.

So from the standpoint of efficiency alone, a separate department would improve services. But there's also the matter of statute. In the last 23 years, the Division of Education within HEW has had 11 commissioners, most of them of not very high caliber. The job doesn't carry much prestige, and it pays somewhat less than a college president can make or a superintendent of schools in a large district. Cabinet stature might bring the best minds to the service of education.

That would mean we might be able to do some planning. Right now, for example, American schools are said to be very weak in foreign languages. What are we doing about it? If anybody in the federal government is speaking out on this subject, I've missed it. But if a Secretary of Education thought the lack was crucial and said so, we would hear about it on the evening news.

Opponents will surely point out that a department status for education will cost money and that, with a new department, there will be a tendency to spend more money.

Why not? What better objective than excellence in education can we spend money on?

Housed as it now is in HEW, education gets the leavings. The department's expenditures are based almost entirely on the numbers of aged or infirm who have a draft on the government. So there is little room for thinking in terms of spending innovatively. HEW Secretary Joseph Califano and his assistants can't do much planning because their main task is to keep up with the bills.

I don't blame Califano for opposing a Department of Education. No government official ever wants to surrender a piece of his turf. But on grounds of efficiency as well as the proper recognition of national values, it seems to me that Jimmy Carter's promise to the teachers is one we should help him fulfill.

THE DEATH OF E. HARRY AGNEW AND E. HUGH AGNEW

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, last November, in the brief space of one week, a distinguished South Carolina family lost two of its most outstanding representatives, and our State lost two citizens of character and ability who had rendered public service of the highest order. The 12th day of the month brought news of the untimely death of E. Harry Agnew, of Starr, S.C., judge of the 10th Judicial Circuit of South Carolina. Four days later, E. Hugh Agnew, also of Starr, the former president of the South Carolina Farm Bureau Federation and father of the judge, also passed away.

The senior Agnew, who was 83, experienced high accomplishment early in life. He graduated from Clemson College in 1916 as the top ranking military cadet. Thereafter, achievement followed achievement throughout his long life.

Among the many offices which he held at one time or another were directorships of the Saluda County Farm Bureau, the Southern Farm Bureau Casualty Insurance Co., and the South Carolina Chamber of Commerce; the presidency of the Farm Bureau Fire Insurance Co.; membership on the South Carolina Ports Authority Planning Commission, the South Carolina Highway Safety Administration, the Saluda County Farm Bureau, and the Clemson University Board of Visitors; and the chairmanship of the Anderson County Democratic Party and chapters of the American Red Cross, the T.B. Association, and the Cancer Crusade. He also served as assistant commandant at Clemson College and an officer of the Production Credit Association and National Farm Loan Association in Anderson and Oconee Counties.

He was best known, however, for his work as president of the South Carolina Farm Bureau Association, a post he held from 1945 to 1960. Under his leadership, the federation increased its membership tenfold, from 5,000 to more than 50,000.

His knowledge of farming was so extensive, and his reputation in the field was so high, that on numerous occasions he was invited to testify before congressional committees on agriculture. In 1952, Progressive Farmer magazine, in appreciation of his efforts on behalf of agriculture in South Carolina, named him "Man of the Year."

Hugh Agnew served his country as a first lieutenant in World War I, and was a faithful and active member of Starr Baptist Church. Somehow he also found time to rear a fine family of two sons and three daughters, in whom he instilled his concern for others and his zeal for public service. This was probably his greatest accomplishment.

One of his sons, E. Harry Agnew, grew up to become a lawyer. Like his father, he barely had time to complete a college degree before his career was interrupted by war. Shouldering his responsibility without hesitation, he compiled an exemplary record as a radar navigator-bombardier in the Army Air Force. He flew 30 missions in Europe during World War II.

After the war, he entered law school at the University of South Carolina—he had been an undergraduate at Furman—and also entered the State House of Representatives. The respect which he enjoyed among his fellow citizens of Anderson County is clearly demonstrated by their choice of him to represent them at such an early age.

Upon completion of law school, he opened an office in Anderson, S.C., and before long was serving as attorney for Anderson County as well as for the cities of Anderson, Honea Path, and Iva. The 10th circuit judge at that time, J. B. Pruitt, was Harry Agnew's uncle. When Judge Pruitt died in the middle of his term in 1966, his nephew was the logical choice to succeed him. He was unanimously reelected by the South Carolina General Assembly in 1973.

Judge Agnew was one of the most highly esteemed judges in the South Carolina judicial system. Courtroom observers often spoke of him as a possible future justice of the State supreme court. While he was scrupulously fair, he knew that we must not allow concern for the rights of the wrongdoer to deny justice to the victims of crime or protection to society. Several years ago, he summed up his judicial approach in a couple of sentences which, in my judgment, deserve to be framed and hung in every judge's chambers:

> Strict interpretation of the law is more wholesome for the future of the country. Too liberal an interpretation favors lawlessness and lack of respect for law and order.

Judge Agnew was only 55 years of age when he died. The best years of a judge's life are often his later years, when he has acquired more experience and has more time to cultivate the spirit of judicial detachment. It is a cruel misfortune that the people of South Carolina will be denied the benefit of the learning and wisdom of Judge Agnew which, having reached their full maturity, promised so much for the decade or two ahead.

We should not, however, lament over what might have been. We should rather rejoice over what was. That, in the case of both Judge Harry Agnew and his father, Hugh Agnew, was life lived as it should be—fully, energetically, courageously, for the benefit of family, friends, and country.

I extend my sincere condolences to all members of the Agnew family. Hugh Agnew leaves behind one son, John Pruitt Agnew of Piedmont, S.C.; three daughters, Mrs. J. Drayton Hopkins of Simpsonville, S.C., Mrs. Donald M. Camp of Bakersfield, Calif.; and Mrs. James E. Findley of Easley, S.C.; his brother Homer G. Agnew of Forest Park, Ga.; 28 grandchildren; and 2 great-grandchildren, The survivors of Harry Agnew include, beside his uncle, brother, sisters, nieces, and nephews, his wife, Mrs. Frances Leonard Agnew, his sons, Hugh, David, Paul, Harry, and Parker, and his daughter Patricia.

The Agnews are a large and close-knit family with great resources of character. While both Hugh and Harry Agnew were old friends of mine. I have had the pleasure of having on my staff for the past year or so Hugh Agnew's granddaughter—Judge Agnew's niece—Miss Georgia Camp, and through her I have gotten to know the Agnew family better than ever before. I admire them greatly. I know that the surviving Agnews will bear their grief with grace and dignity, and that they will carry on the family traditions of service and achievement for many years to come. I know, too, that Hugh and Harry could not have, and would not want, a better monument.

Mr. President, during the sad month of November which saw the death of Hugh and Harry Agnew, a number of articles appeared in their honor in South Carolina newspapers. In order to provide further details of their lives and accomplishments, I ask unanimous consent that the following representative accounts be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the accounts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JUDGE AGNEW DIES

Tenth Judicial Circuit Court Judge E. Harry Agnew, a jurist in Anderson and Oconee counties for the past 11 years, died at 8:40 a.m., Saurday at Anderson Memorial Hospital. He was 55.

Agnew, admitted to the hospital Oct. 15, had been listed in poor condition since abdominal surgery four weeks ago.

Services were scheduled for 3 p.m. Monday at Boulevard Baptist Church by the McDougald Funeral Home with Dr. J. K. Lawton and the Rev. David Wales officiating. Burial will follow in New Silverbrook Cemetery.

Reaction to Agnew's death from friends and the legal community was typical of remarks made by James Woodrow Lewis, chief justice of the S.C. Supreme Court: "Judge Agnew was a gentleman of integrity and honor. Harry was one of the outstanding circuit judges, a dedicated worker and an able judge. We will certainly miss him."

A replacement for Agnew will be nominated by a joint session of the House and Senate after the General Assembly convenes in January, state Sen. T. Ed Garrison, chairman of the Anderson County delegation, said.

A simple majority vote by the General Assembly is required for election, Garrison said. To be eligible, a candidate must be a lawyer with a minimum of five years legal experience and live in the 10th Judicial Circuit (Anderson and Oconee counties).

L. Ed Atwater, the state courts administrator, said in a telephone interview from Columbia the 10th Judicial Circuit will be served until the General Assembly election by a variety of Circuit Court judges with lighter caseloads. No interim judge will be appointed, he said.

Agnew is survived by his wife, Mrs. Frances Leonard Agnew of the home, 2809 Bellview Road; sons, Hugh, Paul and David Agnew of the home, Parker Agnew of Clemson University, Clemson, and Harry Agnew of the University of South Carolina, Columbia; daughter, Miss Patricia Agnew of Charleston; brother, John C. Pruitt Agnew of Piedmont; sisters, Mrs. J. Drayton (Betty) Hopkins of Simpsonville, Mrs. Donald (Izetta) M. Comp of Bakersfield, Calif., and Mrs. James (Floride) E. Findley of Easley.

Judge Agnew's father, E. Hugh Agnew, was listed in fair condition Saturday evening at Anderson Memorial Hospital.

Pallbearers for the funeral are Reese Fant Sr., Frank Williams, Bill Thompson, Jones Ellison, Hovie Watson, Ken Saylors, John Pracht and Jack Radcliffe. The state Supreme Court justices and Circuit Court judges of South Carolina will be honorary pallbearers.

Agnew was first elected judge of the 10th Judicial Circuit in 1966 to fill the unexpired term of his uncle, the late Judge J. B. Pruitt of Anderson. Pruitt died in April, 1966 of a heart attack.

Agnew was unanimously re-elected to his second six-year term in January, 1973 by the South Carolina General Assembly.

Agnew believed in a strict interpretation of the law, and said in an interview in 1971: "Strict interpretation of the law is more wholesome for the future of this country. Too liberal an intepretation favors lawlessness and lack of respect for law and order.

"The laws today are all too often designed to benefit the minority rather than to protect the rights of the majority."

Agnew also did not favor abuse of probation. "Probation is a privilege, not a right," he said. "Those who abuse the privilege should be required to serve some time in jail. . . . I've insisted that probationers comply strictly with the conditions of probation."

Agnew was a native of Starr and a son of Edwin Hugh and the late Izetta Agnew. Edwin Hugh Agnew was an Anderson County agricultural leader who was president of the South Carolina Farm Bureau for many years.

He was a graduate of Starr High School and attended Furman University, where he received his bachelor's degree in 1943.

Agnew then entered the U.S. Air Force and served as a radar navigator-bombardier in the 8th Air Force Division, participating in the European Theater during World War II.

He flew 30 missions in a B–17, and was awarded the Air Medal with five clusters and five campaign ribbons. Later he served as a radar technician instructor at the Yuma, Ariz., Air Force Base.

After his discharge from service, Agnew entered law school at the University of South Carolina. He represented Anderson County in the S.C. House of Representatives from 1947–1950 and was one of the few people named to serve in the General Assembly before completing law school.

He was graduated from the USC law school in 1948, returned to Anderson and opened a law office.

Before being elected judge of the 10th Judicial Circuit in 1966, Agnew served as Anderson County attorney and attorney for the cities of Anderson, Honea Path and Iva.

He also was the governor's appointee on the Reapportionment Committee in 1965 and served on the South Carolina Bar Association's Grievance Committee.

HE'LL BE SORELY MISSED

Judge E. Harry Agnew had planned to go hunting in Delaware with former Tenth Circuit Solicitor Laniel Chapman and other friends this fall. Hunting and fishing were one of Agnew's favorite pastimes.

Judge E. Harry Agnew was a strict judge, one of the few who gave a sentence for marijuana possession. He was a prosecutor's judge, but he also believed in giving a first offender a second chance.

Judge E. Harry Agnew was a family man. He was a good friend, a good lawyer, a good legislator and a good judge. He flew World War II raids over Berlin, fought at the Battle of the Bulge. He won a cluster of ribbons.

He returned to South Carolina and graduated from the University of South Carolina law school. Once he wanted to be in the FBI. But instead he became a city attorney, a county attorney. He didn't complain about his work. His reputation was excellent and statewide.

That's how his friends remembered him. He was 55 years old when he died at Anderson Memorial Hospital at 8:40 a.m. Saturday. He had been sick for several weeks. Services are scheduled at 3 p.m. Monday at Boulevard Baptist Church.

The way the judiciary felt about Agnew statewide was summarized by Ed Atwater, state courts administrator: "He will be sorely missed. Everything I've ever heard about him was good. He was an excellent judge. I will be there for his funeral."

His close friends said this:

Judge W. Howard Ballenger, who holds the second of the two judgeships in the 10th Judicial Circuit (Anderson and Oconee Counties) and friend since 1954, in a telephone interview from his Walhalla home Saturday:

"I feel very inadequate in saying anything . . .

"I think he studied every case he had. He tried to find out as much as he could on a case. He had very high morals."

The circuit judgeship required Agnew to hold court in various places in the state most of the year and Ballenger said, "I ran into his friends everywhere over the state and they all admired him."

Agnew loved to hunt and fish, he said. "He'd get up real early to go fishing. I couldn't get up that early. He did like to hunt and fish but he took care of his business first."

Former Tenth Circuit Solicitor V. Laniel Chapman said Agnew "really enjoyed the outdoors. I think he was really more at peace with himself there than anywhere. We've fished and hunted together ever since he's been in Anderson.

Anderson lawyer Earl M. Rice, who said he had known Agnew "practically all his life" agreed in recalling him as one who loved to hunt "regardless of the success of the hunt"—deer, goose, duck, rabbit, dove and quail.

Rice said Agnew also did a lot of fishing, primarily in Lake Secession before Lake Hartwell was built—"bass, crappie, most anything that would bite."

Chapman said of his professional relationship with Agnew, "It was a pleasure to work with him as a lawyer and as a solicitor . . . I think the Tenth Judicial Circuit has lost an outstanding man that believed in law and order and upheld the legal profession in the highest esteem."

Chapman said he, Agnew and other friends had been making an annual trip to Delaware to go goose-hunting, and that Agnew had planned to go with them this year until he became ill.

Chapman said he regarded Agnew as a brother. "We'd have annual Christmas parties and we've always shared gifts for the last 10 years. . . . It just seems like a bad dream, and I'm going to wake up and it's not going to be true."

State Sen. T. Ed Garrison said of Agnew, "He was . . . very capable and one of the most dedicated judges we've had."

Rice said of Agnew, "He had a tremendous amount of common sense in addition to a good judicial temperament. I think he had a sense of fairness and justice from a common-sense basis that went a long way. He had a kind of innate sense of . . . fair play that kind of rounds out a judge."

Rice and Agnew attended Furman University together, and at that time, Rice said, he did not realize Agnew was interested in law. "I don't know when he made his decision, but it must've been during the war years."

During his undergraduate days, Agnew was "very interested in athletics" Rice recalled, and worked with the manager of the Furman football team, although he did not play on the team.

"I recall in his early days at the bar he considered seriously going into the FBI," Rice said.

Anderson lawyer Jack McIntosh, another longtime acquaintance of Agnew, said "Harry was first of all an excellent lawyer. Harry had a lot of integrity and he represented a wide range of people in his private practice.

"He was helpful to young lawyers when they'd come into practice. Especially, he was helpful to me. He was a well-established lawyer when I started."

Chapman recalled Agnew as a "prosecutor's judge", but a man who also was compassionate. "He was the only judge in the state, I believe, who would give time for simple possession of marijuana. . . . Any and all solicitors, were happy to see him come in the circuit.

"He was assigned over the last five years to Columbia and other places where crime flourished. That's a hard responsibility. I don't think I ever heard him complain about his assignments."

"He did what he thought was right," Ballenger said. "I think he wanted to be as fair as he could."

COLLEAGUES PAUSE TO PAY TRIBUTE TO JUDGE AGNEW

More than 1,000 persons—including a number of state officials—gathered Monday at Boulevard Baptist Church for the funeral of Judge E. Harry Agnew, characterized by the Rev. David Wells as a man who "lived life to its fullest."

Agnew, 55, died early Saturday at Anderson Memorial Hospital. He had been listed in poor condition since abdominal surgery about four weeks ago.

The Anderson County Courthouse closed during the funeral and Oconee General Sessions Court will remain closed until Thursday in honor of Agnew, officials said Monday.

District Solicitor L. Henry Raines' motion was granted by Circuit Court Judge William H. Ballenger shortly after the court convened. Courtroom activity was postponed until 10 a.m. Thursday.

Mr. Wells, who knew Agnew as a fellow student at Furman University, a soldier in World War II, a state representative, lawyer and judge, told mourners he remembered once seeing a gravestone inscribed, "My friend is away—with a friend."

"Because of his courage, because of his faith, because of his integrity . . . I say Judge Agnew, is away with a friend," the minister said.

Dignitaries attending the 3 p.m. funeral at Boulevard Baptist Church included U.S. Senator Strom Thurmond, State Supreme Court Justice Woodrow Lewis and the five other Supreme Court justices, most state circuit court judges, SLED Chief J. P. Strom, former Third District Representative Bryan Dorn and Ed Atwater, acting director of state courts administration.

Agnew was elected judge of the 10th Judicial Circuit—Anderson and Oconee counties—in 1966 to fill the unexpired term of his uncle, the late J. B. Pruitt of Anderson. Pruitt died of a heart attack in April 1966.

Agnew was unanimously reelected to his second six-year term in January 1973 by the South Carolina General Assembly.

He believed in a strict interpretation of the law, and said in a 1971 interview, "Strict interpretation of the law is more wholesome for the future of this country. Too liberal an interpretation favors lawlessness and lack of respect for law and order.

"The laws today are all too often designed to benefit the minority rather than to protect the rights of the majority."

The Rev. J. K. Lawton, one of two ministers conducting the funeral on Monday, called Agnew "a man of great strength—deep inner strength—that furnished support for his family and his closest friends.

"He often expressed his disgust with men who put money first in their lives." Mr. Lawton said. "He loved his family and was generous with himself and his possessions toward them."

A native of Starr, Agnew entered the U.S. Air Force after graduating from Furman University in 1934, and served as a radar navigator-bombadier in the 8th Air Force Division, participating in the European Theater during World War II. He flew a total of 30 missions in a B–17, and was awarded the Air Medal with five clusters and five campaign ribbons. Later he served as a radar technician instructor at the Yuma, Ariz., Air Force Base.

After his discharge from service, Agnew entered law school at the University of South Carolina. He represented Anderson County in the S.C. House of Representatives from 1947 to 1950. He graduated from the USC law school in 1948. He returned to Anderson and opened a law office.

Before being elected judge on the 10th Judicial Circuit in (Anderson and Oconee Counties) in 1966, Agnew served as Anderson County attorney and attorney for the cities of Anderson, Honea Path and Iva. He also was the governor's appointee on the Reapportionment Committee in 1965 and served on the South Carolina Bar Association's Grievance Committee.

ABLE JURIST LOST

It didn't take long after Tenth Circuit Judge E. Harry Agnew took the oath of office for word to get around the state to those guilty of crimes with which they were charged they didn't want to appear in his court.

Judge Agnew won the reputation of a man who dispensed justice, not mercy, from the bench.

When he was administered the oath of office for his first term by Judge T. B. Greneker on May 14, 1966, he told those present in the court room for the ceremony:

"Uncle J. B. Pruitt filled the office in a manner to bring high praise to the judiciary and to this state.

"I know I can not replace him.

"But I will do my best to be a good judge. With God's help and your help the Tenth Judicial Circuit will have a good judge from now on.

"I want to be known as a good judge. I will strive to be fair and honest and I will work hard."

Judge Agnew filled every one of those pledges. He was known by lawyers and his fellow members of the bench as one of the hardest working judges in the state. He was known as one who did not hesitate to tackle the most difficult cases and to be ready to serve where he was needed.

A judge's post is not one from which popularity contests are usually won. Judge Agnew, because of the decisions he was called upon to make, naturally alienated some.

But by most he was regarded as a judge who was stern but fair. For the first time offender he could and did show compassion. The repeater found little sympathy when he stood before him for judgment.

Because of the high esteem with which he was held by both members of the bar and those who faced his Court, Judge Agnew was able to maintain discipline and order without flaunting judicial authority.

Judge and Mrs. Agnew, the former Frances Leonard, were parents of seven children. Judge Agnew was extremely proud of his family.

Judge Agnew's death at the age of 55 removes from the bench an able jurist at the height of his career. The man who follows him will find it extremely difficult to fill his shoes.

[From the Anderson (S.C.) Independent, Nov. 15, 1977]

"HARRY AGNEW: JURIST DEVOTED TO JUSTICE"

The death of Judge E. Harry Agnew of Anderson ended the career of one of the state's most capable jurists.

He was recognized as a judge who advocated firm, but fair, justice.

Judge Agnew took the oath in 1966 when major crime in the state was on the upswing.

He once said: "Strict interpretation of the law is more wholesome for the future of this country. Too liberal an interpretation favors lawlessness and lack of respect of law and order.

"The laws today are all too often designed to benefit the minority (the criminal element) rather than to protect the rights of the majority."

Simply put, he believed a felon should receive a sentence comparable with the seriousness of the crime.

Judge Agnew adhered to this philosophy during his 11 years on the bench. He represented the 10th Judicial Circuit (comprised of Oconee and Anderson counties) with great dedication.

He peppered the cases he presided over with understanding and mercy.

It was often said that having a judge on the state bench with Judge Agnew's personal concept of law and order was a comforting feeling to all law-abiding citizens.

State Supreme Court Chief Justice James Woodrow Lewis summed up the professional esteem for Judge Agnew best. "Judge Agnew was a gentleman of integrity and honor. Harry was one of the outstanding circuit judges, a dedicated worker and an able judge. We will certainly miss him."

But the judge will be missed in other fields other than the judiciary.

Even after he succeeded his late uncle, Judge J. B. Pruitt, on the bench, Judge Agnew never relinquished his interest in the affairs of his community. He was a native of Starr. He cherished his rearing on his family's farm.

He could always be counted on for wise counsel whenever a governmental problem arose, or when some worthwhile campaign seemed stalled.

Judge Agnew was a loving husband to his wife, Frances, and a devoted father to their seven beloved children.

He was an outdooorsman, who could always find a few hours" to go hunting and fishing with his sons or any number of a multitude of friends he amassed during his lifetime of public service.

Numerous praises will be written about Judge Agnew. He deserves all our plaudits. He was that kind of man.

It is tragic that his outstanding tenure on the bench was cut short as he neared the zenith of his career. He had been talked as a future justice on the State supreme court.

But he leaves behind a rich judicial and humanitarian heritage.

Of all his endearing attributes, the one which many of his associates and friends best recall is that he genuinely "cared." He cared about his family, his country, and his fellow man.

The ultimate tribute we can pay Judge Agnew is to encourage young judges, and attorneys aspiring to become judges, to emulate the high caliber example established by his distinguished service on the bench.

Judge Agnew's judicial career helped restore much of the lost meaning to the phrase "justice for all", and for this achievement he will be long remembered.

ELDER AGNEW DEAD AT 83

E. Hugh Agnew, 83, of Starr died early today at Anderson Memorial Hospital following several weeks illness. He was the father of the late E. Harry Agnew, former 10th judicial solicitor, who died Saturday.

The elder Agnew was a native of Canon, Ga., and was a son of the late Edgar Harrison and Jennie Edward Agnew and the widower of Izetta Pruitt Agnew.

He was a top-ranking military cadet at Clemson College in 1916 and was assistant commandant at Clemson College from December 1918 to June 1919. He served three months overseas as a first lieutenant in the infantry.

He was a land bank appraiser for two years and served three years as secretary-treasurer of the Anderson and Oconee Coordinated Unit of Production Credit Association (PCA) and National Farm Loan Association. He also was secretary-treasurer of the individualized PCA in Anderson for six years.

Farm Bureau Federation in 1945, a year after its organization, he remained in the office for 15 years while the federation grew from 5,000 members to its present membership of more than 50,000. He was also a member of the American Farm Bureau Federation's resolutions committee.

Agnew testified at congressional hearings before both Senate and House agricultural committees and assisted in preparing legislation from 1945–1960.

Progressive Farmer magazine named him "Man of the Year" for service to agriculture in South Carolina in 1952. He was a member of the S.C. Historical Society and Pendleton Farmer's Society and an honorary member of the Blue Key Fraternity at Clemson.

Agnew was a member of Starr Baptist Church where he was a member of the board of deacons, a former church treasurer and a men's Bible Class teacher.

E. HUGH AGNEW, FATHER OF JUDGE, DIES AT 83

E. Hugh Agnew, 83, Starr, died early Wednesday at Anderson Memorial Hospital, just four days after the death of his son, Judge E. Harry Agnew.

The elder Agnew, who died after several weeks' illness, was a native of Canon, Ga. and was a son of the late Edgar Harrison and Jennie Edward Agnew and the widower of Izetta Pruitt Agnew.

His son, a former judge of the 10th Judical Circut (Anderson and Oconee counties), died Saturday, about four weeks after undergoing abdominal surgery.

The elder Agnew graduated in 1916 as Clemson College's top ranking military cadet, and served as assistant commandant at the college from December, 1918 to June 1919. He was a first lieutenant in World War I and served three months overseas.

A land bank appraiser for two years, he served three years as secretary-treasure of the Anderson and Oconee Coordinated Unit of Production Credit Association (PCA) and National Farm Loan Association. He also was secretary-treasurer of the individualized PCA in Anderson for six years.

He was elected president of the S.C. Farm Bureau Federation in 1945 and held that office for 15 years while the federation's membership grew from 5,000 to 50,000. He also was a member of the American Farm Bureau Federation's resolutions committee.

AGNEW'S INFLUENCE WIDE

There are few aspects of life in South Carolina upon which E. Hugh Agnew has not had an influence.

A native of Georgia, and a graduate of Clemson College where as a cadet his leadership potential became apparent, he spent most of his life as a resident of Anderson County.

His sharp, incisive mind led him to have a wide range of interests from agriculture to politics, to civic and church affairs. He had the will and the energy to be active in them all.

Mr. Agnew is best known statewide for his 15-year leadership of the South Carolina Farm Bureau. During his time at the helm of the organization, its membership soared from 5,000 to 50,000.

He was recognized in Washington as a highly informed spokesman on farm affairs and frequently testified before Congressional committees engaged in formulating agricultural legislation.

In his latter years, infirmities limited his mobility and his eyes failed, but not his mind. He continued alert and keenly interested in events.

His death at the age of 83 ends the career of a man who had contributed much to the progress of his county and his state.

HEALTH CARE FOR OLDER AMERICANS: THE ALTERNATIVES ISSUE

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, at recent Committee on Aging hearings in northern Florida, I was greatly impressed with an example of how homemakers and home nurses make life much more happy and complete for many elderly. A man in Century, Fla., a very small rural town in Florida's Panhandle, had recently lost his wife, and he provided an unforgettable statement:

> When my wife came out of the hospital this last May I was the lonesomest man in the world. I never knew of homemakers, I never knew of these programs. I didn't know. . . I was so far away from reality. . . When I first took my wife home I spent the weekend all by myself. Finally a nurse came over and she got me acquainted with the homemakers. Well, not only are the homemakers doing a good job but this one particular person did such a good job on my home she also became a very, very good friend. She made me feel as though I was not alone anymore. You know, that lonesome feeling is the worst feeling in the world.

All over northern Florida I received similar testimonials and urgent pleas for an increased attention to the expansion of home nursing, home help, and other support services for chronically ill or temporarily homebound elderly.

At other hearings I chaired for the committee here in Washington it has become evident that most of the real initiatives being taken to improve health care for the elderly are being taken by the States. But these innovative programs are often difficult to achieve under Federal policies which have no focus on long-term care initiatives, impose regulatory obstacles preventing the most direct and innovative programs from ever getting off the ground, and hinder, rather than help, development of severely needed community alternatives.

As a result, the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare recently gave the committee its assurances that they will place a very high priority on improving the delivery of long-term care services to the elderly. At my urging, Secretary Califano has announced a consolidation of responsibility for policy development in strategies and services which will support independent living among the chronically ill or disabled within the new Health Care Financing Administration. A timetable for the first steps to be taken has also been provided to the committee, including assurances for development and testing of major structural reforms in service delivery and financing methods.

I know that all States would welcome any such commitment. In fact, State officials in some States are eager to share their experiences with us as we develop long-range policies in care for our Nation's chronically disabled and elderly.

The Florida Legislature recently initiated a promising program which could go a long way to meet the needs of many elderly as well as reverse the institutional bias in medicaid and medicare reimbursement policies, and lower State medicaid costs for support.

In order to encourage as many elderly as possible to remain in family living arrangements in private homes, even when special care is needed, the State will provide a direct subsidy to their families to cover added expenses, including medical and dental expenses not covered by medicare or medicaid and other specialized care needed by the elderly person. The program will enable middle-income families without the resources to keep an older family member at home. The family would normally be forced to find a nursing home, which could be paid for with medicaid funds. Florida's medicaid program pays, at the lowest level, from $535 to $680 a month to a nursing home for caring for an elderly person. Through Florida's new family placement program, similar care, and the added benefit of allowing an elderly person to remain with his own family, can be obtained through an estimated maximum State payment of $240 a month.

Another approach to meet support needs of the elderly is being taken by a nursing home located in a very rural area of north-central Florida. Begun as a skilled nursing facility a number of years ago, the Advent Christian Home in Dowling Park sought to expand its services to the needs of other elderly. The facility now combines a skilled nursing home, a medium-rise congregate housing facility, an outpatient geriatric clinic, completely independent housing units, and a program of home delivered services. This is an excellent example of how the health care and service base of a skilled nursing home can be developed and made available to elderly with many different needs within a community. But it took many years to develop and could not have been achieved if it had to rely on public funding.

The Florida Legislature's Ad Hoc Subcommittee on Nursing Homes has urged that more "campus-type" nursing home programs of this type be encouraged within the State. The subcommittee regards participation of the nursing home in the community to be an important element in improving quality care.

These are simply two new approaches which are being developed and tested in one State, and there are many more in others. The needs are clear. It is time we started asking States how we can help.

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES: A PROMINENT AMERICAN EXPRESSES CONCERN

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I recently received a most perceptive letter regarding the proposed Panama Canal treaties, and I want to take this opportunity to share it with my colleagues in the Senate. The letter comes from one of the more notable figures of our generation, Dr. Edward Teller, whose opinion on defense and foreign policy matters has long been widely respected.

Perhaps best known for his pioneering research work on the development of nuclear weapons, Dr. Teller has been and remains a strong advocate for the peaceful uses of atomic energy. At present, he is a senior fellow of the Hoover Institution on War, Revolution and Peace. Until recently, Dr. Teller served on the Rockefeller Commission on Critical Choices for Americans, and the President's Foreign Intelligence Advisory Board.

In his letter to me, Dr. Teller expresses concern about several specific aspects of the proposed Panama Canal treaties which relate to the future security of the Western Hemisphere. In particular, I find Dr. Teller's comments about the treaty provisions for a new sea-level canal to be of significance to the Senate.

Mr. President, I commend this letter to my colleagues for their thoughtful consideration, and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LAWRENCE LIVERMORE LABORATORY,
January 13, 1978.

Hon. ROBERT DOLE,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR DOLE: I note from accounts in the news that a strong campaign for ratification of the Panama Canal treaties is being launched. At the same time, need for amendments to the treaties are necessary. Also, the need for amendments for the treaties are more widely discussed. Apart from other amendments that may turn out to be necessary, I would like to emphasize the importance of three amendments. The first relating to a possible sea-level canal, the second to the role of the other American states in the question of the treaties and the third concerning unrestricted sovereignty of Panama over the Canal Zone.

In the first place, Article XII of the Panama Canal Treaties should be stricken since it would prevent the United States from negotiating or constructing any sea-level canal connecting the Atlantic and Pacific without Panamanian consent. Other provisions of Article XII do not seem particularly relevant.

COMMENTS

The construction of a sea-level canal across the American isthmus is not a remote possibility. The interoceanic canal studies issued by the Atlantic-Pacific Interoceanic Canal Commission in 1970 clearly explains the importance of such a canal. It also states that the most favorable route across Panama is route 10 which could be excavated by conventional, modern equipment for a cost of approximately three billion dollars. It seems reasonable that this canal should not be constructed except with the consent of Panama.

The Commission studied other routes, particularly Route 17 which lies farther to the east and close to the border of Columbia. This route would have to be excavated by nuclear explosives and the Commission found valid technical reasons against such a procedure. In particular, Route 17 would have to cross a geologic formation which could not sustain even a relatively gentle slope if it exceeds a ratio of 1 in 10 of elevation to distance.

Other routes that could be excavated by nuclear means were discussed in a less thorough manner. Of these, Route 23 through Columbia and Panama, Route 25 through Columbia alone and Route 8 through Nicaragua and Costa Rica were considered. Among these routes, 23 and 25 would be competitive with Route 10 while Route 8 would be twice as expensive. Among all the routes the Panamanian Route 10 and the Columbian Route 25 appear to be most promising. Route 25 was not taken seriously at the time of the study since the study concentrated on construction in Panama.

It is noteworthy that the U.S.S.R. would not be excluded from constructing a sea-level canal by means of nuclear excavation with or without involvement of Panama. The Soviet Union is in a particularly favorable position to take advantage of this possibility since they are actually practicing the art of nuclear excavation in the Pechora-Kama canal which would deflect the waters of the Pechora from the arctic into the Kama and Volga rivers and eventually into the Caspian Sea, thus preventing further drop of the level of the Caspian.

A sea-level canal, particularly a broad canal excavated in part by nuclear means could handle commercial and military traffic in a much more satisfactory manner, would be much less vulnerable, and would require minimal maintenance.

It would be difficult to conceive of a more persuasive, stable and diplomatically acceptable device to maintain friendly relations with Panama than to offer to join with her in construction of a sea-level canal. If we should be free to join with a third nation for a competitive enterprise, it would be much easier to obtain an agreement from Panama.

In the spirit of the rest of this letter I would hope that in future considerations of a sea-level canal, the interest and cooperation of other American states will be sought.

My second proposal, which would perhaps be more difficult to implement, is to require that in order for the treaties to be valid the Organization of American States should have to ratify these documents by two-thirds majority of its member states. This would help to recognize the common interest of American States in the interoceanic canal; it would also help remove objections against the U.S. that we are still behaving as a colonial power; and it would greatly enhance the posture, prestige, and future effectiveness of the OAS in the Western Hemisphere.

COMMENTS

The aims of the OAS include strengthening the peace and security of the Western Hemisphere as well as providing for the collective security of its members. The voice of this organization has not been heard nor has its opinion been asked for on this matter of great import to the organization and to the individual members. Reports of individual meetings between the President and leaders of member states should not be substitued for the official approval of the OAS acting as an independent agency.

The United States and Panama, as members of the OAS, may agree to submit the Panama Canal Treaties for OAS approval. If the need for formal ratification cannot be agreed upon, then the U.S. Senate, acting unilaterally, should request an expression of approval from that organization.

My third proposal is connected with the proposed unconditional transfer of sovereignty over the Canal Zone to the Panamanians. I suggest that we transfer sovereignty with the condition that any specific action of Panama in the Canal Zone which endangers the common defense of our hemisphere is subject to veto by the vote of two-thirds of the members of the OAS.

COMMENTS

By recognition of Panama's unqualified sovereignty over the Canal Zone, the U.S. takes a far-reaching and irrevocable step. Although the two treaties concerning the future of the Panama Canal purport to guarantee certain rights and privileges for the U.S. and Panama assumes duties and obligations in connection with operating the Canal, none of these grants or assumptions are made to the exclusion of Panama's sovereign rights, power, and authority.

Many provisions in these treaties are presently in contention because of the ambiguous treatment that they provide in establishing U.S. rights and interests. The nations of the Western Hemisphere, and in particular the United States, will have to remain responsible for the safety of this part of the world. We have reason to worry about further intrusion of Soviet Russia into the Western Hemisphere. The reasons are obvious: Cuba and the strength of the Russian navy. Such an intrusion would appear to be contrary to the common interest of the members of the OAS and the veto power of the OAS may become a badly needed protection. If the needed two-thirds majority should not be forthcoming, we would indeed be in a poor position independent of the issue of the Panama Canal.

The proposed changes would constitute real improvements in the safety of the sea lanes, particularly because our sister republics would become guarantors of the Treaty. This would be advantageous in case the question of Guantanamo Bay came up. The Panama Canal Treaty as it stands provides encouragement and opportunity for the Cubans to demand that we hand over Guantanamo Bay. A Russian naval base at that location could be much more dangerous to the American Navy, the Trident and Polaris force, and to the control of our vital sea lanes than anything that may happen in the present Canal Zone. If we strengthen the ties in the Organization of American States, particularly with reference to naval matters, then the dangers connected with Guantanamo Bay can be faced in a more effective manner.

Yours sincerely,

EDWARD TELLER.

CONSERVATION WHERE THE TALL CORN GROWS

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, soil conservation is an issue of immediate concern to Iowans. We have more than 36 million acres of land in the State, and more than 20 million acres of that in row crops—and therefore extremely vulnerable to erosion. The U.S. Soil Conservation Service estimates that we lose on the average 13 tons per acre from sloping crop land. That level of soil loss is almost 3 times the 5 tons per acre loss that can be sustained by natural rebuilding. Even worse, during years of heavy rains like 1974, the loss figures climb to 40 or 50 tons per acre, or more.

We have good programs to deal with soil ersoion, but they have a huge task. To help, Iowa's farmers are looking closely at practices that greatly promote conservation like no-till farming. In a very timely article from Soil Conservation, the U.S. Department of Agriculture's monthly soil conservation report, Mr. William Brune, Iowa State Conservationist describes soil conservation needs and accomplishments in the State of Iowa. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this important article be printed in the RECORD:

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONSERVATION—WHERE THE TALL CORN GROWS

(By William J. Brune)

You won't find major professional sports teams in Iowa. Or surfing. Or subways.

What you will find is high-producing farmland, and a lot of it. It's the State's most valuable natural resource, and everyone from the Governor on down will tell you so.

Iowa's first governor, Ansel Briggs, who settled in our Maquoketa Valley in the 1830's, ran for office on the slogan: "No banks but soil banks, and they well tilled."

Iowa is landlocked; we're about as far from an ocean (1,200 miles) as any State in the Union. Our "Little Switzerland" hills in the northeast corner of the State are beautiful, but they are unlikely to inspire a songwriter to compose "Iowa Mountain High." We don't have 10,000 natural lakes, like one of our neighbors. Most of our lakes are manmade, to provide water for drinking, for livestock and irrigation, and for fire protection and recreation.

What we do have is a reputation as the place "where the tall corn grows." We produce about one-fifth of the Nation's corn crop. We also produce more than one-fifth of the pork supply and one-seventh of the grain-fed beef. In all, with 95 percent of "the beautiful land" in agricultural use, Iowa produces 10 percent of America's food supply.

Our population is relatively small. Bordered on the east by the Mississippi River and on the west by the Missouri, Iowa's 36 million acres are home for fewer than 3 million people. That's half the population of Massachusetts, for example, in an area seven times as large. We still have room to stretch and breathe in Iowa.

While we're basically rural, we also have important industries Iowa is either home base or boasts the largest factory for John Deere, Maytag, Amana, Quaker Oats, Lennox, Massey-Ferguson, and Winnebago, to name but a few. Most of our industries either process farm products or sell to farmers.

With this farm orientation, people here believe that agriculture and soil and water management are pretty important. The town businessman is just as interested as the farmer in the weather, prices, and yields. One-third of all Iowa workers, in fact, depend directly on agriculture for their jobs, and another 50 percent depend on it indirectly.

Weather is the most popular topic of conservation, and we have all kinds. Take 1977, for example. After the worst drought in central Iowa in 40 years early last summer, we had the wettest August on record around Des Moines.

Our close ties to the land may explain why Iowa was one of the first States with an erosion control law and the first State to appropriate cost-share funds for soil conservation practices. Iowa has made about $4 million available to landowners in each of the past 2 years. That's in addition to Federal funds. (But we could always use more.)

The funds are put to good use to protect our soil and water. Of Iowa's 36 million acres, 26 million are cropland, with more than 20 million acres in row crops. Some of that land is flat, but much is gently rolling, formed by the action of glaciers in four ice ages.

The soils of Iowa vary widely. Along both of the great rivers that border the State, soils form "sugar clay" loess hills; along the Missouri some are more than 100 feet deep. In north-central Iowa, which is relatively flat, the fertile prairie soils from the State's best corn country. In both northern corners, there are steep hills, and a large part of the land is in grass. In the south, bordering Missouri, soils were formed under grass and forests and are not as productive. Most are on slopes and are subject to severe erosion.

Iowa is well suited to growing corn and soybeans, but the soil needs to be protected with carefully planned conservation systems. Progress in fighting erosion has been steady, but much remains to be done. The Soil Conservation Service estimates that about 40 percent of Iowa soils are adequately protected against erosion from water and wind. Coordinated private, local, State, and Federal efforts will be needed to finish the job.

Iowa needs more farmers with the positive attitude of Vernon "Slewfoot" Hoffman, a Buchanan County producer, who is undaunted by the cost of soil and water conservation measures on his $2,000 to $3,000 an acre farmland.

"I looked at my crops the other day and then told the bankers they'd better get their land tilled if they want a better crop next year," said Hoffman. He had just completed 6,000 feet of terraces on his sloping cropland, commenting "I don't know exactly how these terraces work, but I do know that I can't afford to let this high-priced soil wash away."

Technical help for farmers like Slewfoot Hoffman is provided through 100 soil conservation districts—one in each of our 99 counties and two in Pottawattamie County. SCS has a field office in each, typically with a district conservationist and a technician. The State Department of Soil Conservation hires a clerk for each office, as well as a conservationist aide in some. We really work as a team here in Iowa!

The three or four people in each office serve an average of 1,300 landowners, as well as other members of the public. So far, about half the farmers have conservation plans; the other half don't. But the number with plans and adequate measures installed is growing year by year. We'd like the number to grow faster!

The fact that we have so much crop-land in Iowa—more than 18 other States combined—accounts for our big need for soil and water conservation measures. We estimate that the average annual soil loss for sloping cropland in the State is 13 tons per acre. That's more than twice what it ought to be. During the heavy spring rains of 1974—a truly disastrous season—soil losses of 40 to 50 tons per acre were not uncommon. (Those rains, by the way, were followed by an unprecedented season of terrace-building. It's unfortunate that it takes such a hard lesson to teach some people the value of conservation.)

Today, Iowa's farmers are showing increasing interest in two conservation practices—conservation tillage, including no-till, and parallel terraces with tile drainage. More than 7 million acres of row crops are now grown under some kind of reduced tillage, although we're still arguing for more residue on some soil surfaces. About 2,000 miles of terraces were built in 1976, bringing Iowa's total to 60,000. But many more miles are needed before our soils receive adequate protection.

The installation of tile drains in conjunction with terraces was promoted in the early sixties by an SCS engineer in Iowa. It was his answer to the problem of too much water trapped in terrace channels after heavy rains, particularly in poorly drained soils. What that engineer fought to have accepted a few years ago has since been widely adopted throughout the Service.

The increase in soybean acreage is putting new demands on conservationists. SCS and the soil conservation districts have helped Iowa farmers protect about 5 million acres in the past 16 years. In the same period, however, soybean acreage also increased by 5 million acres, replacing small grains, grass, or rotation crops. This change means we have to take another look at these 5 million "new" cropland acres to see if additional protective measures are needed.

But while we worry a lot about present and future needs, we are proud of past conservation accomplishments. We have 96 small watershed projects, with about one-fourth of them completed. Also in Iowa is the highly successful Little Sioux River Watershed Project, one of the 11 flood control projects authorized in 1944. More than 460 ponds and lakes and 6,200 miles of terraces are located in that project area alone.

Soils have been mapped in half the State's counties, and we're trying hard to complete four more counties a year in the cooperative soil survey program. Our goal is to have all Iowa mapped by 1986.

Four resource conservation and development areas are authorized and are experiencing success in solving local problems. Two other areas are organized and waiting.

In a nutshell, that's the story of conservation in Iowa. We've done a lot of work, but we still have much to do. We have confidence in the commonsense of Iowa farmers when it comes to taking good care of their valuable farmland. We believe that more of them each year are going to get behind soil and water conservation.

The people of Iowa also are optimistic. Where else would you find promoters holding "the world's largest hog race?" Where else would you find a young man selling T-shirts and posters inviting visitors to "Ski Iowa," showing nothing but a snow-covered haystack? SCS and the district commissioners try to share that optimism and look upon the job ahead, not as a trial, but as a challenge.

RESPONSIBILITY FOR HEALTH

Mr. BELLMON. Mr. President, Dr. John H. Knowles, president of the Rockefeller Foundation recently published in the December 1977 issue of Science an interesting and important statement on individual responsibility for health. He emphasizes that the idea of "right" to health should be replaced by that of a moral obligation to preserve one's own health. Unfortunately, according to Dr. Knowles:

> The idea of individual responsibility has given way to that of individual rights—or demands, to be guaranteed by government and delivered by public and private institutions.

Dr. Knowles goes on to suggest that major advances in health will not be achieved by national health insurance, more doctors, or high-cost technologies, but by what individuals are willing to do for themselves. Mr. President, I believe that Dr. Knowles' insights are especially relevant at this time in view of the growing national concern over health care costs and possible new administration proposals for national health insurance. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESPONSIBILITY FOR HEALTH

Most individuals do not worry about their health until they lose it. Uncertain attempts at healthy living may be thwarted by the temptations of a culture whose economy depends on high production and high consumption. Asceticism is reserved for hair-shirted clerics and constipated cranks, and every time one of them dies at the age of 50, the hedonist smiles, inhales deeply, and takes another drink.

Prevention of disease means forsaking the bad habits which many people enjoy—overeating, too much drinking, taking pills, staying up at night, engaging in promiscuous sex, driving too fast, and smoking cigarettes—or, put another way, it means doing things which require special effort—exercising regularly, improving nutrition, going to the dentist, practicing contraception, ensuring harmonious family life, submitting to screening examinations. The idea of individual responsibility flies in the face of American history, which has seen a people steadfastly sanctifying individual freedom while progressively narrowing it through the development of the beneficient state. On the one hand, social Darwinism maintains its hold on the American mind despite the best intentions of the neoliberals. Those who are not supine before the federal Leviathan proclaim the survival of the fittest. On the other, the idea of individual responsibility has given way to that of individual rights—or demands, to be guaranteed by government and delivered by public and private institutions. The cost of private excess is now a national, not an individual, responsibility. This is justified as individual freedom—but one man's freedom in health is another man's shackle in taxes and insurance premiums. I believe the idea of a "right" to health should be replaced by that of a moral obligation to preserve one's own health. The individual then has the "right" to expect help with information, accessible services of good quality, and minimal financial barriers. Meanwhile, the people have been led to believe that national health insurance, more doctors, and greater use of high-cost, hospital-based technologies will improve health. Unfortunately, none of them will.

The barriers to the assumption of responsibility for one's own health are lack of knowledge (implicating the inadequacies of formal education, the too-powerful force of advertising, and the informal systems of continuing education), lack of sufficient interest in and knowledge about what is preventable and the cost/benefit ratios of nationwide health programs, implicating the powerful interests in the health establishment, which could not be less interested, and calling for a much larger investment in fundamental and applied research), and a culture which has progressively eroded the idea of individual responsibility while stressing individual rights, the responsibility of society at large, and the steady growth of production and consumption ("We have met the enemy and he is us!").

The individual must realize that perpetuating the present system of high-cost, after-the-fact medicine will only result in higher costs and greater frustration. The next major advances in the health of the American people will be determined by what the individual is willing to do for himself and for society at large. If he is willing to follow reasonable rules for healthy living, he can extend his life and enhance his own and the nation's productivity. If he is willing to reassert his authority with his children, he can provide for their optimal mental and physical development. If he participates fully in private and public efforts to reduce the hazards of the environment, he can reduce the causes of premature death and disability. If he is unwilling to do these things, he should stop complaining about the rising costs of medical care and the disproportionate share of the gross national product that is consumed by health care. He can either remain the problem or become the solution to it; beneficent government cannot.

GENOCIDE AND HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, last Wednesday, Senator Humphrey's last piece of major legislation, the International Development Cooperation Act of 1978, was introduced. While I am not going to take this time to discuss the merits of this act, I would like to emphasize the concern of this humane and courageous man for our ability to help the poor and destitute in all parts of the world. I believe this concern is representative of our entire Nation's desire to help and protect such people.

However, it should not be forgotten that there is more to helping these individuals than promoting their economic well-being. The late Senator from Minnesota cited:

> The promise of America—a life with dignity in the pursuit of happiness in a free society for our own people and for those throughout the world.

But a free society throughout the world is not possible without necessary safeguards to prevent violations of human rights. Pursuit of happiness is not possible for individuals who live with the fear of being persecuted.

This is why it is time for our Nation to join the 83 other countries who have ratified the Genocide Treaty, which provides for the prevention and punishment of individuals committing this barbarous act. This treaty does more than condemn acts of genocide—it creates a climate of international vigilance for the protection of national, ethnical, racial, and religious groups.

In a world that is economically, politically, and technologically interrelated, moral approbation can be an effective method of protecting human rights. We must become a part of this moral persuasion. We must pass the Genocide Treaty immediately.

POSITION ON ROLLCALL VOTES, FRIDAY, JANUARY 27, 1978

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I was necessarily absent from the proceedings of the Senate on Friday, January 27. Because of the importance of the pending measure, S. 1437, I want to state how I would have voted.

Rollcall vote No. 14 Leg. (motion to table committee amendment creating a defense to obscenity prosecutions that that material is legal in the State in which it was disseminated)—I would have voted "yea."

Rollcall vote No. 15 Leg. (to request the attendance of absent Senators)—I would have voted "yea."

Rollcall vote No. 16 Leg. (motion to table an Allen amendment to the committee amendment on defenses to obscenity prosecutions)—I would have voted "nay."

Rollcall vote No. 17 Leg. (Allen amendment to limit the defense to obscenity prosecutions to material that is legal in the locality in which it was disseminated, rather than in the State)—I would have voted "yea."

Rollcall vote No. 18 Leg. (committee amendment to allow a defense to obscenity prosecutions if the material is legal where it was disseminated)—I would have voted "nay."

"THE NATION'S RURAL ELDERLY"

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, nationally, about 28 percent of our Nation's growing older population reside in the most rural and isolated countryside and small towns. Even in Florida, with its growing retirement centers in and near the larger cities, 18 percent of the total population over 65 live in the most rural counties.

And the proportions of this rural population is increasing dramatically. Between 1960 and 1970, the elderly population of 16 rural counties in north-central Florida, where I recently conducted hearings, has increased by 74 percent. One-third of this rapidly increasing elderly population exist on incomes below the official poverty level. In each of these areas, the most pressing problems of inadequate retirement income, scarce work opportunities, inaccessible health care, and pervasive isolation are much more difficult to overcome.

As one witness described the poverty which plagues the rural elderly: "A lot of people are living in homes where the Moon is shining through." Another witness spoke of a survey of homes which found only 19 in 250 which had indoor toilet facilities.

A witness from a small town in Hamilton County described the differences between what she found there and what she was used to in Jacksonville, where she had lived and worked before retiring to her small, rural hometown. She was brought up very sharply when she found that none of the things many elderly took for granted in the city were available in her small town. There was no transportation and the nearest source of medical supplies was 30 miles away. There was still a grocery store which would deliver, but at an increased price.

It is evident that transportation is a major problem for the elderly in all rural areas of the Nation. This is a problem which has been with us, and recognized, for a long time but precious little has been accomplished.

Section 16(b)(2) of the Urban Mass Transportation Act provides capital assistance grants for private, nonprofit groups to purchase buses, but very few rural communities have been able to take advantage of this program. A rural highway public transportation demonstration project [section 147 of the Federal Aid Highway Act] is now in the second year of a 2-year demonstration to improve rural transportation systems, but there is no information yet available on results. I hope the administration will make strong recommendations early next year based on the results of these demonstrations, and I urge all my colleagues to study them carefully. We must find a way to help with this very urgent problem in rural areas.

The distribution of health services must also be improved. The impact of poor distribution is evident when medicare reimbursement patterns are examined: less than 25 percent of these funds go to the elderly rural areas.

At a hearing in Gainesville, Dr. Richard Reynolds, chief of the department of community health and family medicine at the University of Florida, described unique cooperation between the College of Medicine and nearby counties which has greatly improved ambulatory health care to rural citizens. Three rural health clinics staffed by the Florida College of Medicine faculty and students provide the major source of health care in one rural county and the only source in two other counties. A large share of the care is provided directly by physicians' assistants who reside full time in these communities and are largely responsible for the continuing care and health monitoring of residents. Research conducted as part of the program has shown that physicians' assistants and nurse practitioners can provide a significant portion of the health care needs of the rural elderly in clinics, homes, or extended care institutions. The health services supplied are of high quality, and there has been general acceptance of these practitioners by patients.

Florida's experience has been quite valuable in demonstrating the necessity for authorizing medicare financing for nurse practitioners in rural health clinics. I am very pleased that H.R. 8422, which was signed into law by the President on December 13, 1977 [Public Law 95–210], will greatly facilitate such programs by providing medicare reimbursement directly for physicians' assistants and nurse practitioners in rural clinics.

Other medicare policies which discriminate against rural areas must be thoroughly examined. According to Dr. Reynolds, medicare home health reimbursement policies still shortchange rural areas by requiring that home health agencies provide skilled nursing and one additional service, such as physical therapy, to be eligible for reimbursement. In many rural areas, home health agencies are never established because it is so difficult to acquire the trained personnel to provide the additional service. County health departments, fully capable of providing skilled nursing and other support services in the home, cannot qualify as a home health agency because they cannot meet this medicare guideline.

Two years ago, Congress passed a home health demonstration program to provide expansion and startup grants to home health agencies to help them train personnel, expand their services, and become qualified as home health providers. A number of grants have been made to small, rural county health departments, but the need is still much larger than this program has been able to meet. We need to do more to make it possible for rural county health departments to provide services to the rural elderly.

Other areas which require our attention are providing more incentives to physicians to locate and practice in our Nation's small towns, and further development of adequately trained and supervised paraprofessional personnel to provide support services to the elderly in their own homes.

During the committee's hearings, I was impressed with the opportunities which had been provided to many elderly persons themselves to engage in meaningful work and volunteer activities which at the same time filled the social service and personal support needs of many other elderly. The senior community service employment program, authorized under title IX of the Older Americans Act, has provided employment opportunities for many older Floridians. One program operated by the National Farmer's Union in northern Florida's rural counties, "Green Thumb," is employing close to 600 elderly, and more than one-half of them provide direct services to other elderly which enable them to remain in their own homes.

The Florida Green Thumb director, however, tells me that an additional 500 elderly in the most rural areas of the State are in need of such employment and could be put to work immediately providing services if additional funds were available.

Congress has recognized the immediate and direct impact of this program by almost doubling its funding during the last year, but it is evident that there is a much larger need than we are currently meeting. Florida has set a good example with its senior community service employment programs, demonstrating how a double impact can be obtained by closely coordinating its senior employment programs with manpower needs in services to other elderly.

The committee also received testimony in Florida which indicated the great potential for this "double impact" in senior employment and volunteer programs administered through ACTION. Retired senior volunteers, foster grandparents, senior companions, and older VISTA volunteers are also providing valuable services to other elderly. The funding levels for these programs have been so low, however, that their potential for community service has barely been scratched. It has been very disappointing to note that the ACTION budget estimate for fiscal year 1979 includes a drastic cut in funding for the retired senior volunteer program and no increase of any significance for the foster grandparent program or the senior companion program. This lack of support can only serve to hamper the development of these important volunteer programs. As a member of the Senate Appropriations Committee I will work to see that these budget cuts are restored to a level adequate to continue the growth of volunteer services.

The Older Americans Act must also be closely examined to make sure it does not unintentionally discriminate against rural areas. We heard from many witnesses of the problems encountered in establishing rural nutrition sites under title VII of the Older Americans Act. In order to meet Federal guidelines on the number of people required to set up a program, elderly often have to travel many miles to reach a site, therefore, excluding many from participation. In addition, it is just simply more expensive to provide services in rural areas because of the distances involved and the extra effort which must be given to outreach activities and transportation. Yet, at the same time, the funding formulas under the Older Americans Act, because they are based solely on total elderly population, provide less money to the less densely populated rural areas.

Many people also spoke of the impracticality of the 3-year limitation on Federal funds which is imposed on programs funded under title III of the Older Americans Act. In rural areas, particularly, low tax bases make it more difficult to provide continuation funding for a needed program after the three-year period for Federal funding has expired. Often a local government is already contributing much more than is required under the matching formula in order to meet the needs and it simply cannot put more money into the program, no matter how essential it is. In addition, in rural areas there are rarely other service providers who can support a continuation of the program.

As soon as I returned to Washington, I and a number of my colleagues on the Senate Committee on Aging contacted Secretary Califano to ask that this needed flexibility be provided to rural areas by giving the States the opportunity to determine how long a project should be supported under Older Americans Act funds.

I am pleased to report that the Administration on Aging issued proposed new regulations on December 5, 1977, which would allow the States to make this determination. I think this is a step in the right direction, and I hope that once this change is fully implemented, Florida and other States will find it easier to continue support of many services in rural areas.

A TRIBUTE TO A RARE COLLEAGUE, HUBERT H. HUMPHREY

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, with the countless words of praise and affection that have filled our Nation's conscience, there is probably little more that can be said to illuminate our feelings for our dearest colleague and friend, Senator Hubert H. Humphrey. Yet we know that Hubert would never bypass a chance to say a few, or more than a few, important things about the people, problems, and politics that were woven into the fabric of American life during the past three decades. So it is fitting, today, after the more eloquent eulogies have been spoken, to celebrate the memory of Hubert as we all know it best, to recall his work as a Member of this body which he loved so well, and to think about his buoyant voice that will echo forever in this hallowed Chamber.

Few people have ever combined the extraordinary qualities of heart, mind, and energy as did Hubert Humphrey—a heart filled with compassion, a mind fertile with ideas and solutions, and the energy and ability to translate his beliefs into a towering record of achievement.

His craftsmanship correctly responded to the needs of our time and it is here, in his place of work, that he constructed the legislative memorial that will last always. From the battle for civil rights, to the struggle for justice and economic security for the aging, the poor, the ill, and the dispossessed—Hubert Humphrey as U.S. Senator left an imprint on virtually all our major domestic programs. It was here, too, that he voiced a call for human rights the world over, and he never let us forget that the same promise of dignity and security that we extend to our own countrymen and women is a pledge that we must earnestly extend to all citizens of the planet. His pioneering work on aid and development assistance to foreign countries, his abhorrence of nuclear weapons, and his steadfast search for a proper American role abroad reflected the same hopes and goals that he held for his constituencies in Minnesota and across the Nation.

Hubert's loss is an exceptional blow to the millions and millions of needy men and women here and abroad who benefited so directly from his uncommon and remarkable service. He was their champion, and he will live always in their hearts.

But Hubert's importance to all of us lies not so much in the legislation which bears his stamp, but in the impressions he left on our personalities and in our souls. He chided us always when we acted like a debating society instead of a great legislative body, yet it was his speech and his constant encouragement to do better that made him so dear. When our national spirit lagged, Hubert Humphrey was one of those rare and special people who could renew our hope and get us moving again in the right direction.

All of us have so many stories of Hubert's boundless good will and joy that we could surely go on as long as the best of his finest oratory. My happiest memories will always hark back to the campaign trail in New Jersey, which Hubert loved to travel. He was with me everytime I stood for election, beginning in 1953, and his endurance and vigor in all of his appearances in our State set records in New Jersey politics that few, if any, have ever matched. My wife, Jeanette, will treasure always the experience of working for Hubert when she first came to Washington. And many, many residents of New Jersey will ever regard Hubert as a very special source of inspiration. In all ways, he was New Jersey's favorite son, and in return, on his many visits to our State, he never failed to show his special affection for us.

Each of us will weigh the importance of Hubert in different ways, even as we agree on the special place he will always occupy in our minds. To me, no one will ever exceed his talent for comforting the afflicted and afflicting the comfortable at the crucial moments when both pain and consolation have been so vital to our development as a nation. His talent as a leader and his charm as a person made him the kind of Senator and human being that all of us can look on with great pride.

DR. R. GLENN REED, JR.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, on Friday, December 30, 1977, the State of Georgia lost one of its most outstanding citizens, Dr. R. Glenn Reed, Jr., of Marietta, Ga. His passing will leave a void, not only in the hearts of his family and his many friends throughout the State, but also in the hearts of the nearly 300,000 members of Kiwanis International whom he served so well during his presidency in 1966 and 1967.

Dr. Reed said, in his inaugural address:

> I challenge Kiwanians not just to talk, not just to think, but to see clearly our problems and our opportunities, and then to do something about them.

His year of Kiwanis leadership was based upon this challenge. One of the youngest men ever to hold the Kiwanis presidency—he was 42—he established a special organizational committee, whose findings led to dramatic changes in the organization; changes which, in his view as a young man, were mandatory if Kiwanis was to keep its philosophy and its activity in tune with the times.

One of the findings of the committee led to the establishment by Kiwanis of a system of biennial "major emphasis programs" aimed at helping solve pressing problems of the times. Among those undertaken were Operation Drug Alert, an educational program for parents, children, and citizens; Enrich the Lives of the Aging; and more recently Safeguard Against Crime. The latter, like Operation Drug Alert, was mainly an educational program for people of all ages.

The Special Organizational Study Committee also recommended guidelines for Kiwanis' rapidly expanding program of international extension. Dr. Reed himself chartered new clubs in Japan, the Philippine Islands, Nicaragua, Colombia, and Jamaica. He participated in the development of Kiwanis International Europe. At the time of his death, Kiwanis was serving in 61 nations around the world; and the impetus he and his colleagues provided continues to increase.

Dr. Reed, a licensed dentist, was not in practice at the time of his death, occupying his time, rather, with real estate development and warehousing in the Marietta area.

A lifelong resident of that area, he was a former Young Man of the Year for Cobb County (the county in which Marietta is situated); and one of Georgia's Five Young Men of the Year for 1960. He also served as a delegate to the White House Conference on Aging, and to the White House Conference on International Cooperation.

Dr. Reed leaves a wife, two married daughters, two grandchildren, and a single daughter. He also leaves a record of accomplishment in his professional life, and in his Kiwanis career which will never be forgotten, and which will live in the projects in which he pioneered and to which he gave life and direction.

COMMUNITY MENTAL HEALTH CENTERS AND BIOMEDICAL RESEARCH EXTENSION ACTS

Mr. SCHWEIKER. Mr. President, as the ranking Republican member of the Subcommittee on Health and Scientific Research, I joined with Senator KENNEDY last Friday in introducing S. 2450, legislation to extend with minor modifications some of our important biomedical research programs and Community Mental Health Centers programs. Unfortunately, my remarks on the bill were not included in the RECORD at the time. I would like to make a few brief points about the bill today.

Some of the health activities provided for in S. 2450 are already working well, such as our programs of assistance to medical libraries and the National Research Service Awards, so Senator KENNEDY and the other sponsors of the bill and I are proposing to extend them for 3 years at relatively stable authorization levels. Other programs scheduled to expire at the end of this fiscal year are still being reviewed by the subcommittee with an eye toward more substantive changes as a part of a comprehensive biomedical research policy initiative. In the meantime, however, they cannot be allowed to lapse. Therefore, we are proposing a 1-year extension of the important research and control work of the National Cancer Institute and the National Heart, Lung, and Blood Institute.

Of particular concern to me is the fate of the community mental health centers program. I believe that the CMHC Act badly needs a thorough reevaluation by our Health Subcommittee. Substantive changes in CMHC legislation were last enacted in 1975. Since then, many proposals for major modifications have been advanced by groups within the mental health community. Criticisms of the value of the program have also been voiced. The President's Commission on Mental Health will be formulating a final report in April which we will want to consider. I do not believe that we should act hastily, but we should examine proposals for change very carefully and give all sides an opportunity for a full and fair hearing. For this reason, I am joining with Senator KENNEDY in sponsoring a simple 1-year extension of current law, at the same authorization levels as fiscal year 1978 and with a few very technical modifications. Nothing in this proposal should be interpreted as a commitment to the status quo, and I intend to push for a comprehensive review of the CMHC Act by our subcommittee as soon as possible during this session.

A TRIBUTE TO THE LATE SENATOR METCALF

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, as we open this second session of the 95th Congress, we are without the firm leadership, experience, and devotion of the late Senator Lee Metcalf, who passed away so suddenly last week. A champion of the environment and a dear friend of the consumer, Lee became a truly national leader while never straying from his native Montana constituency. Throughout his 18-year career in the Senate, we often worked together, resulting in a true and lasting friendship. Lee was a good, effective Senator whose presence I am certain will be sorely missed by each and every one of us.

Although geographically, Lee and I represented States that were hundreds of miles apart, we were partners on a number of successful legislative projects. For example, together we fought for more Federal support for education, expansion of Federal assistance for the elderly and disabled, and stronger clean air and water legislation, as well as fair packaging and labeling laws and measures designed to make Government more responsive.

We must also not forget that Lee was a key figure in the 1974 passage of the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Control Act. This landmark legislation would not have overcome the hurdles it did without the hard work and careful analysis for which Lee had such a well-deserved reputation.

My closest and most recent partnership with Lee developed over our efforts to obtain accurate information about the ownership and control of our Nation's industry and business. Beginning in 1974 and 1975 with a report by Lee entitled "Corporate Ownership and Control," I sponsored legislation that was enacted following the close relationship between my subcommittee on securities and Lee's Subcommittee on Reports, Accounting, and Management in the Government Affairs Committee. As a result of this joint effort and Lee's personal involvement in this matter, I believe we are approaching the point where investors, regulators, the national policymakers will have before them firm and accurate information about who owns and controls our Nation's industry and business.

Lee Metcalf's death is a great loss to the people of Montana and the Nation. Jeanette and I offer our heartfelt condolences to his wife, Donna; his mother, Rhoda Metcalf; and his foster son, Jerry.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

AMENDMENT 1677

(Purpose: To clarify intent of current law that political contributions between members of, members elected of, and candidates for Congress are not unlawful)

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I ask that the pending amendment be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Alabama (Mr. ALLEN) proposes an amendment numbered 1677:

On page 78, line 12, strike the word "oral".

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, existing law does not expressly criminalize false oral statements made to Government officials and is restrictive in requiring the false representation to be made in a matter within the official jurisdiction of a department or agency of the U.S. Government. The courts are currently divided as to whether the present statute should be interpreted to include false oral statements, inasmuch as the statute does not specifically make false oral statements criminal and because of obvious first amendment considerations. The criminality of false oral statements under existing law is probably best left to the judiciary, because the first amendment implications can be best decided in that branch of the Government. In no event should Congress now specifically endorse a provision making criminal false oral statements to bureaucrats since such a provision invites abuse by law enforcement officials, because prosecutors could easily set up a "my word against yours" situation when a defendant and a Government official are the only two witnesses. The unfair advantage of the Government official's presumed greater credibility in the eyes of the jury could make the fabrication of charges a potential danger.

By codifying existing law, this amendment would also preserve the narrow construction of the phrase "jurisdiction of any department or agency of the United States" in order to insure that prosecution would only occur in cases involving the carrying out of an official act or investigation of a Federal agency in an area within the scope of that agency's particular authority.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I hope that this amendment will not be accepted. I think one of the responsibilities of this legislation is to try to present to the courts the final and best judgment of the Members of the Legislature, rather than just leaving the issue open to how the courts would perceive adequate protections under this provision. The fact is, Mr. President, that five of the circuit courts have found that the application of the provisions which are included in this section apply not only to written but to oral statements as well. There is only one circuit, I understand, that has restricted these provisions to oral statements. Therefore, the great weight of authority is as we have it written here in this code. It seems to me that, since that represents, by about a 5-to-1 majority, the interpretations of the various circuit courts, we have some degree of responsibility for certainty in this particular provision. I believe that that is not an inconsequential consideration, when we consider the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Beyond that, Mr President, unlike the present law, the defendant, under S. 1437, must know that he or she is speaking to a Government agent. Thus, undercover agents may not trick an individual into uttering a falsehood when he is unaware of the true identity of the person to whom he is speaking.

Second, and most important, S. 1437 provides that an oral false statement may not be prosecuted unless, before it was given, the defendant was advised that making such statement would be an offense or the statement was volunteered. Even though it is our understanding that the law would include written as well as oral statements, we have added these additional defenses. Thus, before an oral false statement may form the basis of an offense under the proposed new code, either the defendant must have been put on notice that he is under constraint to speak truthfully, or he must have initiated the statement, such as by telephoning the FBI and making a false statement or accusation of a crime—if they volunteer it.

Beyond that, Mr. President, there is the recantation defense, which does not exist in law. That means that, even if the defendant knows that he is talking to a law enforcement official, even if he has been warned on the nature of the statement, and even if he gives a false statement, if he recants it within a period of 7 days, he cannot be prosecuted under this provision.

So these, I think, are very substantial improvements in terms of the protection of rights and liberties.

I think, Mr. President, the practical fact is that we do not have prosecutions that are brought when there is just the word of one individual against another.

With these provisions, Mr. President, the bill represents a marked improvement over current law. It justly punishes persons who deliberately would mislead the Government in an official matter, while containing safeguards that serve to shield the person, who makes a casual false oral remark to a Government investigator, from being criminally prosecuted. Mr. President, the pending amendment seeks to undo the improvements that the Judiciary committee has made in this area.

For these reasons, Mr. President, we have sought to clarify, for the purposes of the Criminal Code, what our belief is on the application of oral and written false statements.

Second, we believe it does represent the current law, the clear majority of the decisions of the circuits.

Third, we believe that the defenses which are included in this provision in terms of knowledge that it is an official, that they be warned about the nature of the statement, and the recantation defense, improve this important area.

Therefore, it seems to me it would be a mistake to accept the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. President, I pointed out that 18 U.S.C. 1001 has been interpreted to cover oral as well as written statements and it has been upheld in the United States against McCue.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the pertinent cases of the various circuit courts and the revelant sections of those cases, which would reflect what current law for the great majority of the American people is in this particular area.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. v. Lambert (5th Cir.) (including Alabama)—

Receiving and acting on statements of one kind or another is central to the function of the FBI. Perversion of a governmental body's function is the hallmark of a § 1001 offense. United States v. Gilliland, 312 U.S. 86, 93, 61 S.Ct. 518, 522, 85 L.Ed. 598, 603–604 (1941). Statements such as that given by appellant and falsely pointing to possible criminal conduct that is within the power of the FBI to investigate carry a substantial potential for wasting the Bureau's time and thus perverting its central function. We, therefore, hold that such a statement is a "matter within [FBI] jurisdiction" under § 1001.

U.S. v. Mahler, 363 F. 2d 673 (CA 2, 1966)—

Similarly, 18 U.S.C. § 1001 covers oral as well as written statements, and Mahler's testimony was the sort that has been held in this circuit to violate the section. United States v. McCue, supra 301 F.2d at 454–456.

United States v. Goldfine 538 F. 2d 815 (1976)—

In the course of the investigation of this case, Darrell Goldfine, after having received Miranda warnings, was asked by Compliance Investigators of the Drug Enforcement Administration whether he had made any out-of-state purchases. The investigators already knew that he had. He stated that he had not. For that false statement he was charged with a violation of § 1001.

[8] Relying on United States v. Bedore, 455 F.2d 1109 (9th Cir. 1972), Goldfine contends that the statement here was not the kind of statement that the statute was intended to reach.

The statement here was made by a registrant in the course of an inspection conducted by the regulatory agency charged with the duty of investigating the manner in which he was complying with the requirements imposed upon him by law. This is far different from the sort of statement discussed in Bedore which the court there noted was "unrelated to any claim of the declarant to a privilege from the United States * * *." 455 F.2d. at 1111.

[9] Goldfine contends that the statement should fall within the "exculpatory-to" exception recognized by some courts, e.g. Paternostro v. United States, 311 F.2d 288 (5th Cir. 1972); United States v. Chevar, 526 F.2d 178 (1st Cir. 1975); United States v. Bush, 503 F.2d 813(5th Cir. 1974). In Brandow v. United States, supra, this court refused to give recognition to this exception in a case where the exculpatory denial was given to agents of a regulatory agency conducting a criminal investigation legitimately within its purview. This holding has been followed in United States v. Ratner, 464 F.2d 101,102–5 (9th Cir. 1972). See also: Cooper v. United States, 282 F.2d 127 (9th Cir. 1960).

We conclude that the conviction of Darrell Goldfine of violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1001 was not erroneous.

United States v. Adler 380 F.2d 917 (1967)—

Moreover, the Friedman majority's restrictive interpretation of the word "jurisdiction" as used in § 1001 cannot be reconciled with the broad interpretation applied to other terms in the statute. The word "statement" has been construed to include statements not required to be made by law, not under oath, and not in writing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

The amendment was rejected.

COMMITTEE AMENDMENT—PAGE 76, LINE 19

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next committee amendment.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

On page 76, line 19, after the colon, strike "a Class E felony." and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(1) a Class E felony in the circumstances set forth in subsection (a)(2);

"(2) a Class A misdemeanor in the circumstances set forth in subsection (a)(1).

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, one reason that the bill has taken so long to clear the Senate is the fact that a number of changes need to be made in the bill. Some of the committee amendments needed to be considered separately, not considered en bloc. Some needed to be rejected, most of them accepted.

But by keeping the bill before the Senate for several days, we have given Senators an opportunity to study this tremendous bill which, supposedly, embraces all of the Federal statutory law, and as we noticed in the argument by the distinguished manager of the bill, also, the decision law of the Federal courts in criminal matters. Literally dozens of amendments have been accepted by the managers of the bill. A number of committee amendments have been rejected.

I heard just the other day from the Alabama director of the Department of Conservation which handles the enforcement of our game and fish laws, and he was afraid that under the wording of the bill the Federal Government was moving into the area of enforcing criminal laws with respect to nonmigratory birds.

I understood that that was not the intention of the bill, but yet, the wording did alarm my State officials and has been one of my objections to the bill throughout, that it does increase Federal jurisdiction in areas that heretofore have been reserved to the States.

As the distinguished manager of the bill knows, section 1862 of the bill would continue, at least to some extent, the provisions of the Assimilative Crimes Act by making criminal under Federal law violations of State or local law in a Federal enclave. The report on S. 1437 states that section 1862 is not intended to disrupt the general rules which have developed in the case law over the years in interpreting the Assimilative Crimes Act both with respect to the elements of the State or local crime assimilated and with respect to the types of crimes that are assimilated under the act.

The present situation under the Assimilative Crimes Act with respect to State game laws is that State officials have exclusive authority to enforce State game laws even within Federal enclaves. This exclusive authority is inferred from the fact that the Congress in 1916 enacted the Migratory Bird Treaty Act (16 U.S.C. 703 et seq.) which gave the Federal Government exclusive authority over game laws regarding migratory birds and implied thereby that States would continue to have exclusive authority over nonmigratory animals.

Is it the understanding of the distinguished manager of the bill that section 1862(a)(3) preserves to the States exclusive authority to enforce State game laws even within Federal enclaves?

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator is correct.

That is the intent of that subsection of the section dealing with violators of State or local law in a Federal enclave.

The Senator stated it correctly.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the distinguished manager of the bill.

That will remove the objection that Mr. Claude Kelly, director of the Department of Conservation of the State of Alabama, had to the bill.

I thank the distinguished manager of the bill.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ANDERSON). Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECESS TO 10 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today it stand in recess until the hour of 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CRIMINAL CODE REFORM ACT OF 1977

The Senate continued with the consideration of S. 1437.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I hope that the Senate will continue to make progress on the pending business today, and if in the opinion of the manager of the bill, Mr. KENNEDY, and the ranking manager, Mr. THURMOND, it would be productive to go into the evening today, then the leadership on this side of the aisle certainly is in accordance with that viewpoint.

I would hope it would be possible to complete action on this bill today.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HODGES). Without objection, it is so ordered.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1150

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment and ask unanimous consent that it may be considered at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. REIGLE). Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request?

Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Alabama (Mr. ALLEN) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1150:

On page 373, line 28, delete "an offense" and insert in lieu thereof "a misdemeanor".

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, this amendment amends the bill at page 373, starting on line 26.

Under the committee amendment, it is provided that an Indian juvenile, or Indian person, between the ages of 18 and 21, if arrested and charged with an offense and an Indian tribe has concurrent jurisdiction over the conduct, the Attorney General may forgo prosecution and surrender the person to the jurisdiction of the tribe governing such area of Indian country, the trouble being that the Indian tribe has authority to levy a sentence, or impose a sentence, of only 6 months.

With the wording of the amendment—it uses the words "an offense"—it could be a felony and even could be a capital case or one in which a long sentence is imposed.

All this amendment does is to provide that if such person is charged with a misdemeanor, it changes the word "offense" to "misdemeanor." So if a misdemeanor is committed, then they would have authority to turn it over to the Indian tribe, rather than for the Federal courts to handle the matter, inasmuch as they do have the authority to impose a 6-month sentence.

I have talked to the distinguished manager of the bill about this matter, and I hope he will agree to the amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, we will accept the amendment.

The Senator from Alabama correctly states the provisions in the legislation which give the Attorney General discretion—I underscore the term "discretion"—to forgo prosecution of an Indian less than 21 years of age who is charged with an offense, and surrender such Indian person to the Indian tribe having "concurrent jurisdiction" of the conduct. The Senator from Alabama is apparently concerned that this will permit the Attorney General to forgo prosecution even of an Indian juvenile charged with a serious Federal felony.

Let me assure the Senator from Alabama that no such result is intended or possible under this provision. That is so because, under the provisions of title 25 of the United States Code, tribal courts have no jurisdiction over serious felonies—they can only prosecute for minor or petty offenses. Accordingly, this provision would not confer authority on the Attorney General to turn over to a tribe an Indian charged with a serious felony. However, in order to further clarify this matter, I would not object to an amendment to explicitly limit the provision to minor crimes, by deleting the words "an offense" and inserting in lieu thereof "a misdemeanor."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1151

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be in order to consider the amendment at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Alabama (Mr. ALLEN) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1151:

On page 28, lines 25 and 26 strike the following:

"(c) Jurisdiction not an element of the offense—the existence of Federal jurisdiction is not an element of the offense."

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, this is a most important amendment. It goes to the very basic thrust of the entire bill. It knocks out two lines in the bill, but in a sense they are the very heart of the bill. It knocks out the following language on page 28, starting on line 25:

Jurisdiction Not an Element of Offense. The existence of federal jurisdiction is not an element of the offense.

We are codifying the Federal criminal statutory law and the Federal criminal decision law. To say that the existence of Federal jurisdiction is not an element of the offense certainly would go contrary to the very nature and thrust of the bill, because we are supposed to be talking about Federal jurisdiction and we are supposed to be talking about Federal criminal law. If we provide that the existence of Federal jurisdiction is not an element of the offense, under the present law it would be a question of fact for the jury to determine whether the facts constituted or allowed for Federal jurisdiction.

I understand that the purpose of the thrust of this change would be that the court would determine whether Federal jurisdiction did exist. But to say bluntly that the existence of Federal jurisdiction is not an element of the offense certainly would seem to go contrary to the very purpose of the bill.

It seems to me, as I view the whole thrust of the bill, that this is another power grab for the Federal courts, in that it does extend the jurisdiction of the Federal court to matters now within the jurisdiction of State courts. It looks as though the purpose of this is to increase and broaden the jurisdiction of the Federal courts, and I feel that the provision should be stricken from the bill.

I believe that this is so important that I ask for the yeas and nays at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, under most existing Federal criminal statutes, the basis for the exercise of Federal criminal jurisdiction is commingled with the description of the criminal misconduct. In fact, in existing statutes the jurisdictional factor is often cast as the prominent factor, making the underlying criminal misconduct appear as a matter of secondary importance. For example, what would be cast in a State statute as robbery is case in one of the equivalent Federal statutes as obstruct[ing] or delay[ing], commerce . . . by robbery; what would be cast in a State statute as "kidnapping" was cast until 1972 in the equivalent Federal statute as "transport[ing] in interstate or foreign commerce, any person who has been . . . kidnapped." The historical reason for such an approach to the drafting of Federal offenses is, of course, to assure the appropriate limitation of the reach of Federal power to that granted the Federal Government by the Constitution. But in the course of limiting the reach of Federal jurisdiction, the current approach has several disadvantages. First, it leads to the formulation of offenses which, by design or by interpretation, unnecessarily require proof that the defendant know or intended that his conduct would violate a Federal interest (for example, that the mails would be used by an accomplice in the commission of a major fraud). Second, it encourages considerable redundancy in that each time Congress applies a criminal offense in a new situation (for example, covering assault on an "official guest of the United States") an entire new statute setting forth the underlying misconduct is required (instead of simply adding, for example, to a general assault statute a new jurisdictional base permitting prosecution if the victim is an "official guest of the United States"). Third, in the course of writing such redundant definitions of the same misconduct, troublesome variations occur when they are interpreted and applied by the courts (for example, an assault occurring upon a Federal officer may be interpreted differently from an assault occurring upon a citizen in a national park). Fourth, it permits the unnecessary multiplication of the potential criminal charges (for example, theft of a Government check from the mails on a military base today may be prosecuted as three offenses—theft of Government property, theft from the mails, and theft in a geographic area under Federal jurisdiction). Fifth, it frustrates extradition of American criminals who have fled to other nations since most applicable extradition treaties describe offenses in terms of the underlying misconduct rather than a jurisdictional factor (for example, "interstate travel with intent to . . ."), and several foreign nations have refused to extradite criminals when the peculiar American definition of such offenses comes to their attention. Several other difficulties also exist with the current approach.

The code takes a far simpler approach to Federal jurisdiction, but an approach that still permits the restraint of Federal jurisdiction to its appropriate boundaries. It defines offenses in terms of the underlying misconduct (for example, the conduct constituting kidnaping) just as a State criminal code does, but in a separate subsection of each offense it specifies the particular circumstances under which the Federal Government may exercise jurisdiction to investigate and prosecute for the criminal conduct (for example, the transportation of a kidnaping victim across a State line). The basis for Federal jurisdiction is not a part of the offense that is required to be proved to a jury; but in each case it will still have to be proved to a judge bevond a reasonable doubt. This approach to Federal jurisdiction permits far clearer definitions of offenses and much simpler instructions to juries, and it allows consolidation of numerous existing offenses into a single offense with several jurisdictional bases (for example, the code single theft offense is possible because in a separate subsection there is a listing of several specified circumstances that would each permit the Federal Government to prosecute for the theft). Throughout the code, the jurisdictional bases have been carefully tailored to avoid any unnecessary expansion of the reach of existing Federal jurisdiction.

Mr. President, I think this is an extremely important amendment, and for the reasons that I mentioned here I hope that the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, as we understood this bill is supposed to be a codification of existing stautory law and the decision law that is clear and unequivocal.

However, this does make a basic change in who shall determine jurisdiction, whether it shall be by the jury, which always has been the body that decides questions of fact, or shall it be by a Federal judge jealous of his jurisdiction and prerogative. I believe we will have come much nearer having a fair decision if we left in the hands of the jury the right to determine issues of fact.

So what we are doing here is greatly changing the existing Federal law. Far from being merely a codification of existing law, this changes the whole basic concept of who shall determine the existence of the fact of jurisdiction or the nonexistence of that fact. Traditionally, juries have been determiners of fact and courts have been the appliers of law based on those facts.

So this changes the whole concept of the corresponding duties and functions of the jury vis-a-vis the court. And I would much rather leave this question in the hands of the jury than to leave it in the hands of a life-appointed Federal judge, jealous of his jurisdiction.

The amendment is striking out this language changing the matter of jurisdiction of offenses, and I hope that the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. KENNEDY. May I ask the Senator from Alabama a question? We were able to consolidate various offenses, for example, 70 different theft offenses that appear throughout the criminal code, and bring them into one section. In theft, for example, there is one section with many different jurisdictional bases. Would the Senator not agree with me that if the amendment of the Senator from Alabama were accepted we would have to go back to the existing law—70 offenses of theft, for example? We would be right back to where we started in terms of a current hodgepodge code. Obviously one of the bases for this codification is to try and simplify it and make it understandable.

Obviously what we did is consider jurisdiction separately. We defined the offense of theft and consider jurisdiction separately. If we had to establish the Federal jurisdiction for each and every theft offense, we would be right back where we were with 70 different theft offenses in the Criminal Code, each one of them drawn or stated differently. Would that not in effect be one of the practical effects of the Senator's amendment?

Mr. ALLEN. No, I do not think so. I think that under the present law it is up to the jury to determine this fact, and I do not know that it is any more a difficult determination than any other fact that might be submitted to them, and I believe the distinguished Senator's statement that the court would determine the matter of jurisdiction beyond a reasonable doubt is based upon an amendment that has not yet been agreed to. Is that correct?

Mr. KENNEDY. Will the Senator state it again, please?

Mr. ALLEN. I am under the impression that the Senator's statement that the question of jurisdiction is to be determined by the court if my amendment is not agreed to and that decision must be on a finding beyond all reasonable doubt—and that is true—is based upon a committee amendment that has not yet been agreed to. Is that not correct?

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator is correct. The provisions under the committee amendment at 326 require that. The Government has the burden of proving the existence of Federal jurisdiction over the offense as set forth in title 18 United States Code, beyond a reasonable doubt. We have been moving, as the Senator well knows, through various committee amendments, and that one has not yet been accepted. But it will be if we are successful.

Mr. ALLEN. I understand. The Senator was speaking of that as though it were a present fact. I do not believe that is in the bill as of now.

But the fact remains that the Senator is taking this determination, even under the committee amendment yet to be adopted, out of the hands of the jury and placing it in the hands of the court, even though the statement is made time and time again here on the floor that we are just codifying the present law and the present decision law.

All my amendment does in knocking out these two lines is to leave present law where it is and leave this important determination in the hands of the jury, and I would certainly rather risk my faith at the bar of justice if I were accused of violating the Federal law, and I would rather leave the matter of determining the facts involving jurisdiction in the hands of a jury rather than in the hands of a Federal judge.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I will not delay the Senate long. I point out that this issue was gone into in depth by the Brown Commission and they made the recommendation which we have accepted in this legislation. In the court holdings, for example, U.S. against Miller, the Federal courts have taken judicial notice of the existence of Federal jurisdiction. So in many instances today the Federal courts understand that the issue of jurisdiction is an issue of law and not an issue of fact. It is an issue of law and they have made such findings. This concept is a linchpin in terms of our ability to consolidate under S. 1437.

We believe the court holdings are such that the courts themselves take judicial notice of this fact, and we believe, as the Brown Commission pointed out, this issue is basically an issue of law and not an issue of fact.

So, for those reasons, we are opposed to this amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. As to the question of jurisdiction being a question of law, of course, under present law it is a question of fact and then it would be entirely appropriate that the court apply the law after the jury has determined the facts. That would keep the traditional relationship between court and jury intact. That is the tradition which has existed in Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence, I assume, for centuries, that the jury is the determiner of the facts and the court is the applier of the law based on the facts determined by the jury.

I do not believe this matter of jurisdiction not being an element of the offense, as provided in the bill, should be allowed to remain in the bill, and the amendment would strike it out.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, usually the distinguished Senator from Alabama (Mr. ALLEN) and I are on the same side.

I think, however, in this case I will have to oppose this amendment.

I might say in the report on the Criminal Code Reform Act of 1977 on page 40,* this statement was made on this particular subject:

> Subsection (c) states that the existence of Federal jurisdiction is not an element of an offense. The purpose of this provision is to lay the groundwork for the Committee's decision, implemented in the procedural portion of the subject bill,[44] that the question whether Federal jurisdiction has been proved be for the court rather than the jury.[45] The National Commission included in an identical sentence in its proposed Code.[46] As it aptly observed: "Jurisdiction is not an element of an offense . . . because jurisdiction goes only to the power of a government to prosecute. Whether or not it is proper for the federal government to prosecute is a separate question from whether or not the defendant has done something criminal." [47] Although current Federal statutes are almost all written so as to commingle the issue of jurisdiction with the elements of the offense,[48] some courts have recognized that jurisdiction is a severable issue which is no part of the crime.[49] Indeed, Federal Courts have taken judicial notice of the existence of Federal jurisdiction.[50]

Now, Mr. President, we feel that the way this statute is written, it is embodied in the Federal code here, is proper and it should remain.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, if the Senator from Alabama has nothing further, I make a motion to table, and I move to table the amendment and ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to lay on the table of Mr. ALLEN's UP Amendment No. 1151. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

I also announce that the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. LONG) is absent because of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Chair asks that we have order, please. I think some of the confusion of a few moments ago was due to too much noise on the floor.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, the purpose for the division was to get a positive vote on the committee amendment on page 76. Basically, it is on the grading provision, and strikes "a class E felony." I hope that the committee amendment will be accepted.

I understand that a division is in order, so those who support the basic committee amendment at the time of the division will indicate by rising.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, did not the Chair announce the voice vote?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No, the Chair did not announce the result of the voice vote. The Chair said it appeared that the nays had it.

Mr. ALLEN. I have no objection to the amendment, but I thought it carried by a top-heavy vote of 1 to 0.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A division has been requested. Those Senators in favor of the committee amendment on page 76 will rise and stand until counted.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I hope those who support the committee amendment will all rise at this time.

I thank those who rise at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (after a pause). Those opposed will rise and stand until counted.

On a division, the committee amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next committee amendment.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

On page 78, line 15, after "assigned" insert "noncriminal";

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Alabama has a question that he wants to raise. I am glad to entertain a colloquy with the Senator.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. President, the distinguished manager of the bill has, I am sure, noted the slight change in the wording of present law regarding tax evasion which is made in section 1401 of the bill. The bill provides that it is an offense to "evade liability for a tax," whereas present law refers to "evading a tax." I am advised that the reason for inserting the words, "liability for," is strictly a drafting preference and is not intended in any way to change the mens rea requirements of present law or to increase the scope of present law.

In other words, the insertion of the words, "liability for," does not imply that the mental state of seeking to avoid liability for a tax in some fashion thought by the taxpayer to be lawful would satisfy the culpability standard prescribed in this section of the bill. Is it correct, then, that the insertion of the words, "liability for," does not in any way change the existing culpability level required by present tax law?

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, the answer is yes, this change was made merely for consistency in drafting and is not intended to increase the scope of the statute or to modify the mens rea requirements of present law.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the distinguished floor manager.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1152

(Purpose: To insure that judges do not improperly invade the province of juries by intimation or action)

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the amendment?

Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from North Carolina (Mr. MORGAN) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1152:

On page 14, after line 13, insert the following:

"§ 105. Comments by Judges

"No judge, during the course of a criminal trial or in giving a charge to a jury in a criminal action under this Title, shall give an opinion whether a fact is fully or sufficiently proven, that being the true office and province of the jury."

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, if my colleagues will give me about 5 minutes of their time, I think this is an important amendment.

I must say in all candor, I approached the manager of the bill rather late with it. I am not on the Judiciary Committee, and I have other duties with other committees. I have not kept abreast of this bill as much as I would like to.

But this is an amendment I feel very strongly about. I believe if the Senate were aware of it, they would vote with us.

The findings of facts in a jury case, in a criminal case, and in many civil cases, is within the province of the jury.

In the State of North Carolina, and in most States, there is a prohibition against judges expressing an opinion with regard to the credibility of the evidence in a trial of a case.

Mr. President, this does not apply to Federal courts. A Federal judge can, if he wants to, in the presence of the jury just simply say, "Now, while, gentlemen of the jury, it is your prerogative to find the facts, I do not believe the testimony of this witness, and I do not think you believe it," just so long as he reminds the jury it is their province to find the facts, he can say anything he wants to.

That is a two-edged sword, Mr. President. I have tried a lot of cases in Federal court and I can name one Federal judge who thinks everybody ought to be in prison. He is sort of prosecution-minded. He has been a former U.S. attorney. We come in with a defense, present the finest witnesses in the world, and he can just express his opinion to the jury that he does not believe what the witness had to say. But as long as somewhere along the way he emphasizes or says, "It is your province to find the facts," it is permissible under the Federal law.

We have another Federal judge down my way, and I will not call any names, who does not think anybody ought to be in jail. He is right on the other side. He will, quite frankly, tell the jury while a law enforcement officer is testifying on the stand that he does not think this witness is worthy of belief, that he questions the credibility of the witness.

This presents a rather difficult situation, and I have had it happen to me many times.

If we look under rule 30 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure found in title 18 of the Code, we will find several cases under this section. I had intended to bring it over, but I did not realize we were likely to finish this bill tonight as quickly as we are going to.

We will find many cases that have gone to the courts of appeals or to the Supreme Court in which it is spelled out that the judge in the Federal court has that prerogative as long as he emphasizes that it is a jury's final prerogative. But in almost every case that has gone to a court of appeals or the Supreme Court, the trial judge has been reversed for abuse of discretion.

But the difficulty is, Mr. President, it takes $2,500 as a minimum to appeal a case from a district court to a court of appeals. How many poor defendants have been convicted or, on the other hand, how many have been turned loose, by a judge expressing an opinion on the credibility of evidence?

And the judges become somewhat, sometimes, biased or calloused no matter how hard they try not to become that way.

I think if we are going to have the jury system that the judge ought not. We ought to leave it to the jury. It has worked very well in North Carolina for 200 years.

I want to read just a quote from one case in the North Carolina Supreme Court with regard to this very matter.

The North Carolina Supreme Court said that the founders of our legal system intended that the right to trial by jury should be a vital force in the administration of justice. They realized that this could not be if the jury should become a mere unthinking echo of the judge's will. To insure against this, they clearly demarcated the respective functions of the judge and the jury in criminal trials by State law.

The section I seek to add to S. 1437 would simply incorporate this approach into Federal law. It would deny a judge presiding at a jury trial the right in any manner or in any form, by word of mouth or by action, to invade the prerogative of the jury in its right to find the facts. The section is designed to make effective the right of every litigant to have his cause considered with the "cold neutrality of the impartial judge" and the equally unbiased mind of a properly instructed jury. As we all know, this is vital, for the slightest intimation from a judge as to the strength of the evidence, or as to credibility of the witness, will always have great weight with the jury, and, therefore we must be careful to see that there is no undue prejudice by any expression from the bench.

That statement, Mr. President, is a direct quote from the court of appeals, and I have forgotten the circuit, but it is 447 2d Federal Reporter on this very case.

Let me say it again:

The slightest intimation from a judge as to the strength of the evidence, or as to credibility of the witness, will always have great weight with the jury, and, therefore we must be careful to see that there is no undue prejudice by any expression from the bench.

If we take a 12-man jury, they have high regard for the judge, and the judge can almost indicate his feeling to them by his demeanor, the tone of his remarks. But to let him go ahead and express his opinion as to whether or not a witness is telling the truth and then cover it up by saying,, "Well, now, I don't believe him, but you know, you are the finders of the fact," I think puts an undue burden on the defendant.

As I say, almost every case that has ever gone to the court of appeals or Supreme Court, the judge has been reversed. But I have had clients. and I have had it done to me and my clients, when we could not afford to appeal.

I think if it has worked in the State courts it should work in the Federal courts.

I thank my distinguished colleague (Mr. KENNEDY), who has done such a good job on this bill, for his willingness to try to work out something later on. He agreed that maybe if I would hold the amendment we would work, probably, with the House. I think we may still be able to. But, on the other hand, I would rather take it the other way, if the Senate will adopt it, and then if the House is not willing to buy it, we will drop it in the committee and then I will offer it as a separate bill.

But it is something I feel very strongly about. I will not talk about the quality of cases I have represented because a lot of them were moonshine cases. But I expect I have tried as many criminal cases in the Federal courts as maybe any Member of the Senate, and this is something that has always sort of stuck in my craw.

So, Mr. President, I hope my colleagues will adopt it. Then if Senator KENNEDY finds in steering this bill through the House that it puts any undue problem, I will be willing to drop it and come back with a separate bill later.

I thank the Chair.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina has followed this bill closely. I recall seeing him in the Chamber during the opening statements. He has taken an interest in the issues that are before us. He is a member of the bar and has been a distinguished attorney general. We welcome his comments and his help on many matters that come before the Judiciary Committee.

The concern I have is that there really has not been a record of abuse in this area.

As I understand, one of the major reasons for this particular authority in the Federal courts is that in many cases that come before the Federal courts—such as securities cases, antitrust cases, and complex narcotics cases—it is of some value for judges to be able to comment on the evidence in a fair and dispassionate way, so that there can be a fairer rendering of the verdict. This is one of the principal reasons why there is a reluctance to deny the judges the opportunity to comment.

We have not found this to be an area of any abuse. Obviously, if there is such abuse in the Federal courts, it can be appealed and reversed. So protections are there, and the appellate courts have placed strong restrictions on the lower courts in these areas.

Mr. President, I am extremely reluctant to accept this measure without comment from the bar, the judicial conference and others. I mentioned that to the Senator from North Carolina, and he said, "We know how they will come out on it." That may very well be true.

However, with the understanding of the Senator from South Carolina, I would be willing to accept the amendment and explore the matter further; with the understanding that we will make inquiry of the particular interest groups. We will have a few months to inquire. If this is going to present any significant problem, we will find it difficult to press it in conference. We will ask that it be accepted for the time being.

I should like the Senator from North Carolina to join the Senator from South Carolina, and I in addressing letters to inquire of the various groups which would have an interest in this area. We will do that immediately.

We will talk with the House Members; and if the case can be made, I am sure they will accept it. If the case cannot be made, we will follow the orderly route and reject the amendment in conference.

If that is agreeable to the Senator from North Carolina, and with the understanding of the Senator from South Carolina, we will be willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. I thank the distinguished Senator. I appreciate that. I understand his point of view. If it will cause any problems later, I will understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, because of a prior commitment, I may not be present in the Chamber when the final vote occurs. Therefore, I wish to take this opportunity to commend the distinguished floor leaders of this bill, Senator KENNEDY and Senator THURMOND, for the very fine job they have done, and to commend the entire Judiciary Committee, which has spent endless hours working on what is perhaps one of the most complex and important bills to come before the Senate, one that has been badly needed for many, many years.

As an attorney general of North Carolina, I undertook to codify the criminal code of North Carolina which had been enacted over a period of 200 years. I know how difficult it was then to pull together all the criminal laws of the State in one bill which could be acceptable to a majority of the members of the legislature. The Judiciary Committee has done a splendid job, and they should be commended.

I have had correspondence from some of my constituents and have read editorials in some of the newspapers in my State opposing provisions of this bill. I say to those who have opposition to some provisions of the bill that I am not entirely sold on it, but I do not believe anyone could draft a bill of this magnitude that would please everybody. I am sure that I could not draft one that I could look back on 2 months from now and be satisfied with. The committee deserves the praise of the entire Senate. I expect to cast my vote for the bill because it is badly needed.

One final word: I commend the distinguished Senator from Alabama. He has remained in the Chamber and has considered this bill diligently. He has offered many amendments, most of which I voted against. But the floor managers have accepted many of his amendments, and I believe they add to the strength of this bill. He deserves the appreciation of the Senate and the country. It is a better bill decause of what he has done. Because of his diligence, the bill has been discussed more thoroughly and can be understood more thoroughly by the people around the country.

I just wanted to express these views for the record, in case I were not present when the final vote occurred.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORGAN. I yield.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator for his kind and generous remarks about my efforts with respect to the bill.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Richard Arnold of my staff be permitted the privilege of the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BUMPERS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1153

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask unanimous consent that it may be considered at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment wil be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Alabama (Mr. ALLEN) proposes unprinted amendment No. 1153. .

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 261, strike out lines 28, 29, 30, and 31, and substitute in lieu thereof the following:

"'(b) Psychiatric Examination and Report.—Prior to the date of the hearing, the court may order that a psychiatric examination of the defendant be conducted and that a psychiatric report be filed with the court; provided however, that if the hearing shall be conducted on motion of the attorney for the government, then the defendant may refuse such psychiatric examination or, in the alternative, may designate an additional examiner to those examiners as may be selected by the court pursuant to section 3616(b); provided further, that any psychiatric examination and report ordered under this section shall not be a basis for commitment of the person to be examined except for the period of the examination itself, not to exceed fifteen (15) days and such commitment shall be to the custody of the attorney general of the court for placement in the suitable facility closest to the court. As used herein, "suitable facility" means a facility that is suitable to provide for prompt psychiatric examination of the defendant given the nature of the offense and the characteristics of the defendant.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, this amendment will modify the novel procedure set forth in the proposed code which permits incarceration for a period of up to 45 days, without a prior hearing, for the purpose of conducting a psychiatric examination of a defendant. The potential for abuse of this section is so obvious as to merit little discussion.

The proposed amendment, the amendment I have just offered, would allow psychiatric examination after a motion for a hearing to determine mental competency to stand trial and before a hearing on that issue. But it would include minimal safeguards against abuse by allowing the defendant to refuse such examination if the motion for a hearing to determine competency were made in the first instance by the attorney for the Government, and it would further permit the defendant, in that case, to designate at least one examiner in the event the defendant did consent to the examination. If the defendant moved for, or the court, sua sponte, ordered, a hearing to determine competency to stand trial, then in the court's discretion the defendant could be required to undergo psychiatric examination and would not have the right to designate an examiner. However, the examination would still be limited to a period not to exceed 15 days. It changes the 45 days down to 15 days, which should be sufficient incarceration for the purpose of making a psychiatric examination.

I have discussed this matter with the managers of the bill, and I believe they are willing to accept it.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, this has been an area which has been of great interest to our colleague, the Senator from Wyoming, who spent a good deal of time on this particular issue.

I am going to recommend we accept this amendment. I will point out that we reduced the time from 60 days to 45 days during the course of our markup, and now the Senator wants to cut it down to 15 days.

What we are obviously balancing here is sufficient time to get a proper psychiatric examination versus delay in the release of an offender. I think one would be hard-pressed, quite frankly, to get a proper examination within 15 days. But I will agree to the amendment.

I would point out a couple of other safeguards. We write into the law the right of habeas corpus. Any member of the family, even during this period, can sue for release—any member of the family.

Second, we do require a higher standard for commitment. Instead of "a preponderance of the evidence," we require "clear and convincing evidence" that it is necessary, so we have raised the standard.

The real question as to time is what is needed to make an adequate, fair test. But we are sensitive to the issue of individual liberty.

I think this is satisfactory, this shorter period of time, and I am willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, we have no objection.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the managers of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

The amendment was agreed to.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1154

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I send another amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Alabama (Mr. ALLEN) on behalf of himself, Mr. HATCH, and Mr. HELMS, proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1154.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that it may be in order to consider this amendment at this time. It is not to the committee amendment or to the bill itself but to one of the composite amendments that will later be filed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 211, delete lines 27 through 36 and insert in lieu thereof:

(1) by amending subsection (e) by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "The provisions of section 1617 of title 18, United States Code, do not apply to an offense under this subsection.".

On line 37, delete "(3)" and insert "(2)"

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, this is a very important amendment and the distinguished manager of the bill recogizes the merit of it. The amendment is to a large amendment which is to be filed, No. 1624, and it contains a provision amending the OSHA statute.

It provides that the first offense after the assessment of a penalty against an employer under the OSHA statute should constitute an offense.

Heretofore these have been civil impositions of penalties. This would be a radical departure from the OSHA statute, and at a time when we are having a measure of success in having the OSHA statute applied in a reasonable fashion rather than for employers to be penalized for minor infractions, it seems that it would certainly be ill advised to move in the opposite direction and make a criminal out of an employer for the first offense after a penalty has been assessed. That would make him a criminal for the rest of his life and go against his record.

I do not believe, and apparently the committee agrees, that that was the intent of this amendment. But this amendment that I am now offering knocks out this language and leaves the present OSHA statute as it is. It does not criminalize the offenses or the violations under the OSHA statute.

I have discussed it with the managers of the bill, and I believe they agree that the amendment should be agreed to.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, we will be willing to accept this amendment, although I personally am reluctant to do so.

Under the present law the only criminal penalty that results is when there is death. Anything less than death results in no criminal penalty.

But the Judiciary Committee is not the appropriate forum to make a judgment on this particular issue. The committee that is involved here ought to make the judgment on it.

The amendment of the Senator from Alabama is basically a restatement of current law, and I am very much aware of what the mood of the Senate is with regard to OSHA penalties, so by accepting the amendment of the Senator from Alabama we will effectively return to current law. That seems to me to be the best way to handle this particular situation.

As the Senator from Alabama correctly pointed out, in this particular area we raised the penalty. The Senator wants to restore existing law, and that is satisfactory to me. I would hope the amendment would be agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I believe what the amendment does is it eliminates what the Senator's amendment does, it eliminates this requirement that death result, and imposes a criminal penalty for the second offense no matter whether injury or death is involved, and that is what we eliminate.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I think the amendment of the distinguished Senator from Alabama is wholesome and will be helpful, and we are pleased to accept it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate? If not, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

The amendment was agreed to.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1155

Mr. ALLEN. I send another amendment to the desk and I ask unanimous consent that it may be in order to consider the amendment at this time, and I further risk unanimous consent after the amendment is stated that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Alabama (Mr. ALLEN) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1155 to amendment 1624.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 246, add the following new subparagraph after line 8:

"(p) A new section 6035 of title 39, United States Code, is added to read as follows:

"SEC. 6035. Mailing, importing, or transporting obscene matter.

"(a) Every article or thing designed, adapted, or intended for producing abortion, or for any indecent or immoral use; and

"Every article, instrument, substance, drug, medicine, or thing which is advertised or described in a manner calculated to lead another to use or apply it for producing abortion, or for any indecent or immoral purpose; and

"Every written or printed card, letter, circular, book, pamphlet, advertisement, or notice of any kind giving information, directly or indirectly, where, or how, or from whom, or by what means any of such mentioned matters, articles, or things may be obtained or made, or where or by whom any act or operation of any kind for the procuring or producing of abortion will be done or performed, or how or by what means abortion may be produced, whether sealed or unsealed; and

"Every paper, writing, advertisement, or representation that any article, instrument, substance, drug, medicine, or thing may, or can, be used or applied for producing abortion, or for any indecent or immoral purpose; and

"Every description calculated to induce or incite a person to so use or apply any such article, instrument, substance, drug, medicine, or thing—

"Is declared to be nonmailable matter and shall not be conveyed in the mails or delivered from any post office or by any letter carrier.

"Whoever knowingly uses the mails for the mailing, carriage in the mails, or delivery of anything declared by this subsection or section 3001(3) of title 39 to be nonmailable, or knowingly causes to be delivered by mail according to the direction thereon, or at the place at which it is directed to be delivered by the person to whom it is addressed, or knowingly takes any such thing from the mails for the purpose of circulating or disposing thereof, or of aiding in the circulation or disposition thereof, shall be guilty of a Class D felony.

"The term 'indecent', as used in this subsection includes matter of a character tending to incite arson, murder, or assassination.

"(b) Whoever brings into the United States, or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, or knowingly uses any express company or other common carrier, for carriage in interstate commerce or foreign commerce any drug, medicine, article, or thing designed, adapted, or intended for producing abortion, or for any indecent or immoral use; or any written or printed card, letter, circular, book, pamphlet, advestisement, or notice of any kind giving information, directly or indirectly, where, how or of whom, or by what means any of such mentioned articles, matters, or things may be obtained or made; or whoever knowingly takes from such express company or other commn carrier any matter or thing the carriage of which is herein made unlawful, shall be guilty of a Class D felony.".

On page 246, line 9, delete "(p)" and insert "(q)".

On page 246, after line 12, delete the quotation marks and second period at the end of the item relating to section 6034.

On page 246, after line 12, add after the item relating to section 6034 the following new item:

"6035. Mailing, importing, or transporting obscene matter.".

On page 246, line 13, delete "(q)" and insert "(r)".

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, the committee amendments dropped the prohibition against advertising for abortions. What this amendment does is reinsert that provision and maintain the present law.

I understand that the committee is reducing the penalty in obscenity cases, I believe, from 5 years down to 2, and while I oppose that, I am not making any point about it. But this amendment does reinstate the penalty against disseminating materials urging abortions or advertising for an abortion. I believe that, as was the case with the other amendments, the manager of the bill will accept the amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, this is a case where we will have the restoration of current law. No cases have ever been prosecuted under this provision. I myself have some questions about its constitutionality, but I do not object to the restoration of the current law, and I urge the Senate to accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, the amendment is acceptable to us.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1156

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Arkansas (Mr. BUMPERS) offers an unprinted amendment numbered 1156.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I object. I have no idea what this amendment is. I have been here 5½ hours, and this is the first I have heard of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard. The clerk will state the full amendment.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

On page 78, line 12, after "(A)" insert the following: "willfully and knowingly".

On page 78, line 22, after "(B)" insert the following: "willfully and knowingly".

On page 78, line 23, after "(C)" insert the following: "willfully and knowingly".

On page 78, line 29, after "(E)" insert the following: "willfully and knowingly".

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, let me say I will not press this point, because the point is fairly clear from the amendment, but I will say that this whole section 1343 on making false statements causes me considerable pause. When I discovered that a person could be charged with a criminal offense for making a statement which was false but not known to him to be false at the time, or could even, under subsection (C), omit a material fact necessary to make a written statement not misleading, and none of these things have to be done willfully and knowingly on the part of the person making the statement, and yet he could be charged with the offense, it seemed to me that the very least we could do would be to provide that people who make innocent statements not be subjected to prosecution, particularly when they are making them to some person who appears, just on the face of it, to be a Federal bureaucrat.

I think every aggressive prosecutor in the country could urge this provision to get everybody he did not happen to like. So I urge the committee to accept these qualifying terms.

I do not know of any State criminal code in the United States that does not provide that any statement, in order for the maker to be charged with perjury or anything else, has to be made knowingly and willfully.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENNEDY. I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, the adding of the particular words "willfull and reckless" that the Senator adds in these particular provisions—or "willfull and knowing" is unnecessary. First of all, whenever the state of mind is not stated, as it is not stated in these particular offenses, S. 1437 states in chapter 3 section 303(b) that the required state of mind for an existing circumstance, if not specified is "reckless."

"Reckless" is defined on page 34 as follows:

A person's state of mind is reckless with respect to:

"(1) an existing circumstance if he is aware of a risk that the circumstance exists but disregards the risk;

"(2) a result of his conduct if he is aware of a risk that the result will occur but disregards the risk;

* * * The risk must be of such a nature and degree that to disregard it constitutes a gross deviation of the standard of care that a reasonable person would exercise in such a situation. (Emphasis added.)

Then it is further defined, on page 35:

'reckless', this requirement can be satisfied alternatively by proof of an 'international' or 'knowing' state of mind;

So the fact that we did not describe the nature of the state of mind is already predetermined in other provisions of the legislation, as to what standard will apply. What we have provided in this particular offense is that "reckless" would apply to the issue of the defendant's awareness of the existence of the falsity of his statement. This is intended to parallel and incorporate the "conscious disregard" for the truth standard of the Hanlon case.

The only reluctance we have to use the Senator's words, is that what we have tried to do is reduce the number of possibilities from 80 to 4. We have defined those standards as clearly and precisely as we could to include the various courses of conduct, which would indicate to juries as well as prosecutors and others what they would have to prove to establish clearly the proper state of mind.

I want to assure the Senator from Arkansas that those provisions which the Senator read have not been created without a state of mind as we defined it. They would be covered by "reckless," and I believe that establishes the level of culpability, particularly as it is defined, which the Senator from Arkansas would seem to want.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, looking at the language which is described by the Senator from Massachusetts, I see where it says, in section 303, at line 33, that a state of mind must be proved with respect to the element of an offense, except that:

no state of mind must be proved with respect to a particular element of an offense if that element is specified in the description of the offense as existing or occurring 'in fact';

That is not totally clear to me, but it looks to me as though it could be an exception.

Second, it says:

no state of mind must be proved with respect to any element of an offense described in a statute outside this title, or described in this title as a violation of a statute outside this title, or described in a regulation or rule issued pursuant to such a statute, if the description of the offense does not specify any state of mind with respect to that element and the legislative purpose of the statute does not compel a contrary interpretation.

First of all, I defy any judge in the United States to know what that means.

Mr. KENNEDY. That does not apply, Senator. That does not apply to any offense within this new title 18. It has absolutely no application.

Mr. BUMPERS. What part of the statute is the Senator relying on?

Mr. KENNEDY. Well, the language the Senator just read makes it clear that it applies to the regulatory offenses which are not incorporated in title 18, but the provision the Senator reads does not apply to the code offenses.

Mr. BUMPERS. What citation was the Senator referring me to?

We have established, as I mentioned before, that if culpability is not specified, rather than writing "reckless" into every part, or "knowingly" into every part—there are four different culpabilities as descriptive words in every part of this statute. What we have done is indicate where those particular standards apply. In this, I just want to give assurance—because of the way the Senator presented it, I think it would appear that we did not have a culpability term. We do. "Reckless" applies to these different provisions.

If the Senator wanted to change the word "reckless" to "knowingly," we could probably do that if the Senator feels better. We could clarify that in a clarifying amendment. I would not have any objection to that. That would be entirely satisfactory to us, provided that its purpose is to clarify the fact that we are only seeking to preserve existing law. To insure that no person is unfairly charged for mere forgetfulness, or a merely negligent ommission. That was never intended, as I am sure a careful reading of the culpability sections and the committee report will indicate.

The only other point is that I am reminded that "reckless," is the closest term which is consistent with the case law in this particular crime. That is the reason we have used it.

Mr. BUMPERS. In the definition of "reckless," it says:

A person's state of mind is reckless with respect to: (1) an existing circumstance if he is aware of a risk that the circumstance exists but disregards the risk.

The reason for the amendment is precisely to overcome that very point, that he may not know that there is a risk.

Mr. KENNEDY. If he is not aware of the risk there is no offense. Will the Senator continue reading?

Mr. BUMPERS. No. (2) says:

(2) a result of his conduct if he is aware of a risk that the result will occur but disregards the risk; except that awareness of the risk is not required if its absence is due to self-induced intoxication.

Mr. KENNEDY. But it also says:

The risk must be of such a nature and degree that to disregard it constitutes a gross deviation from the standard of care that a reasonable person would exercise in such a situation.

This last phrase is very important because it makes it very clear that mere error, mere negligence, is not a crime.

I am glad to work with the Senator. I think we are very close. We are basically taking what is case law on this, the closest case law that we could get fitted into the "reckless" definition. We have reduced the number, as I mentioned before, of culpability terms.

We are glad to work and add a better word. We shall be glad to add "knowingly" in this area if the Senator wants to clarify that mere unintentional errors are not an offense and that this clarifying amendment would carry forward existing standards.

Mr. BUMPERS. This amendment, I say to the Senator, that I have offered goes only to section 1343, which deals with falsification of statement. But the same omission occurs in the charge of perjury.

This language dealing with "reckless" may be a qualification of case law. But in all the years of my trial practice, about the only time I ever saw the term "reckless" used was in tort cases, personal injury cases, and automobile accidents. It occurs to me that when we are dealing with a prosecutor's right—which is, I think, more powerful than most of the people in this Chamber understand. We are saying over here in one section, if he makes a false statement or if he makes a statement or he omits to tell something that he should have told, just standing on the face of it, there is no clear reference there that he has to do it intentionally or knowingly. He can do it quite innocently. But then he comes in with a defense, when they charge him, and he says, "Yes, but look over on page 34, where it says 'reckless'."

It occurs to me that any prosecutor would say that a person's state of mind is reckless with respect to an existing circumstance if he is aware of it.

The prosecutor, admittedly, would have to prove that he is aware of it. But why put him to all of that task when every State code in the United States for perjury or falsified statements requires that such omissions or falsifications or perjury have to be intentional and willful?

I cannot see anything that the committee would lose by inserting it in two cases where it is always—always—required as a matter of proof.

Quite frankly, the Senator has called my attention to a part of the bill that I had not seen previously. I did not realize that "knowing" and "reckless" were in here, but I honestly do not believe the term "reckless" covers the two cases I pointed out nearly clearly enough, because it states that his state of mind is reckless if he is aware of the risk. What if he is not aware of the risk and omits to tell something, and he does it quite innocently, because he is not aware of the risk?

The chances are that he can go to jail and there are a few instances of innocent people who did go to jail. In this instance, there might be a bunch of them who will go.

As I say, I would like to see—the "willful" and "knowing" amendment I have offered only goes to 1343, which deals with falsified statements to some Government agent or, really, some bureaucrat who has the authority to administer oaths and it does not make much difference in what form he delivers the oath. There is another provision in here saying that that is not a defense, that he gave an irregular oath.

It is not even a defense that the declarant did not have the authority to make the statement in the first place. So it occurs to me that we are really getting terribly liberal with the prosecutors in this country and giving them freedom to prosecute honestly innocent people in this country who may not look right to them or who may look like a devious character, anyway.

At another time, I shall offer an amendment dealing with the perjury statute. Those are the two statutes I think are important when people give statements and are going to be charged with a crime, that they at least know they are telling a lie when they do it.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, this offense is outlined in 18 U.S.C. 1001. The case law interpretation of 18 U.S.C. 1001 is "reckless." We have basically incorporated that. The Senator from Arkansas, as his amendment now reads, wants to raise the standard. That is a major difference in terms of the current law, in terms of the criteria. Prosecution for innocent errors could not occur, contrary to the Senator's suggestion, because if the defendant is not aware of the risk his statement is false, he is not reckless.

If that is the will of the Senate, then they can make that judgment. But the basic fact is that we have recodified the existing law in terms of the interpretation of the cases.

We have taken the standard of culpability that is in the various cases and brought it in here. The Senator from Arkansas comes in here at the end—and we are glad to entertain it—and asks us to change that particular standard on this particular crime.

Mr. BUMPERS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. No, I shall not yield yet.

It is against that background, Mr. President, that we find on page 34 the best definition taken from law and from language which exists in the case:

A person's state of mind is reckless with respect to:

"(1) an existing circumstance"

Referring back to the particular offense—

if he is aware of a risk that the circumstance exists but disregards the risk;

"(2) a result of his conduct if he is aware of a risk that the result will occur but disregards the risk; except that awareness of the risk is not required if its absence is due to self-induced intoxication. The risk must be of such a nature and degree that to disregard it constitutes a gross deviation from the standard of care that a reasonable person would exercise in such a situation.

Now, the culpability level, coupled with the requirement that the conduct be knowingly engaged in, carries forward effectively the current law, 18 U.S.C. 1001. That is effectively what was recommended to the Brown Commission and others. As I say, the Senate is quite within its power if it wants to vary the criteria.

(Mr. METZENBAUM assumed the chair.)

Mr. KENNEDY. But I just want the Senate to know what the committee did on this particular issue.

It is basically a restatement of existing law. I can understand about the words defined here in section 1343 also relating to another section. But that is what the existing law is in spades—in spades. That is at least the committee's position and the reason for it.

I think the Senate and the committee's position should be sustained.

Mr. BUMPERS. First of all, I do not think the Senator, because of the lateness of the hour, will suggest the language of the bill is sacrosanct.

Second, I would like to point out to the Senator that in section 302, dealing with the words "international, knowing, reckless and negligent states of mind," here is what the bill says.

I want everybody here to understand that an Internal Revenue Service agent, somebody from the Agriculture Department, or any other Federal agent, comes in to ask a question and you think it is a perfectly harmless question, he is not going to give you a Miranda ruling or anything else, but he would like to ask a few questions and you answer the questions as best you can, as honestly as you know how to.

I say that under this bill, in its present state, if you fail to say something you should have said, or something, in all innocence, that turns out to be a misrepresentation, you will be charged, or at least you are subjecting yourself to a criminal charge.

Here, this bill says in section 302——

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator——

Mr. BUMPERS. Wait a minute.

Mr. KENNEDY. The only point I will press again because the Senator is completely misrepresenting and distorting provisions of the legislation—it clearly does not apply to innocent misstatement errors.

The Miranda requirements in terms of notification are outlined on line 19.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President——

Mr. KENNEDY. And in fact, if the Senator will read what is in there, I understand his wanting the high culpability standard, but the only point I make is that I will intercede if there is going to be misrepresentation of what is stated in this.

I will certainly accede to the Senator's right to change the culpability. But when he represents what is in this bill in terms of this particular provision, I feel——

Mr. BUMPERS. I am not on this floor advocating that people misrepresent or lie to a Federal agent or anybody else. What I am concerned about is innocent people.

I practiced trial law for 18 years, and I know what people are capable of doing to themselves. I have tried too many cases in which I have seen too many aggressive, overly ambitious prosecutors trying to stick it in those people. I am trying to protect them from those prosecutors sticking it in, so that the proof required will be substantive and the man actually will be guilty of knowingly and intentionally doing something wrong.

Under this section, where it is intentional and knowing, intentional, reckless, willful. It does not say if a man tells something to another person, as in 1343. It does not say anything about willful or knowing.

There is not any reference back to these definitions. These are simply definitions to be used where those words are found in the statute and they are not found in section 1343 or 1341.

Mr. President, I am just saying that I do not want any innocent people suffering as a result of what we did in haste. I know the hour is late and everybody wants to go home. I do, too. But I want Senators to know I was alarmed when I found out people could be charged for simply making a statement to a bureaucrat who walks into his office, for telling something they did not know was untrue, or for omitting to tell something they did not know anything about.

I just say that under this statute they can be, and I do not think that is what the Senate wants.

I think knowingly and willfully misrepresenting things is the least of justice and something a prosecutor should have to prove in order to charge him with perjury.

He has to in every State law in the world, and I hope he forever has to prove those things.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas made a very eloquent statement about the existing law. and what is wrong with it, about false statements to various inspectors, and all the rest, and what is wrong with it. But I must correct one thing the Senator is wrong in saying these definitions apply only when written in a section. They apply throughout the code.

In this statute, 1437, we can open it up on page 78.

First of all, the defendant has to know he is a law enforcement officer. Can the Senator find where that is stated in the existing law?

He has to know it is an officer. It does not exist.

The concern the Senator from Arkansas has is a legitimate concern with the current law. That is why we are trying to change it, use the same culpability standard which is the existing law and add a couple of other facts.

Second, and then line 19, and in fact, such statement is made after the person has been advised making such a statement is an offense, a Miranda warning.

Find that in existing law. It does not exist.

The Senator makes an eloquent statement why it should be changed. But let alone the recantation defense, I will not even bring that up, which we added, where if he knows he is an officer, he gets Miranda warnings, he lies to them and then within 7 days he says:

I really didn't understand the question.

He has a recantation defense.

That is not under existing law.

Three new protections for him.

If the Senator wants, in terms of the language, to change the particular language to "knowingly" from "reckless" because he thinks it is clearer, I will accede. But I want to study exactly where we will add this language.

I will ask the Senator's amendment be modified if he wants to use another culpability standard.

I think what we attempted to do is restate the existing law on the culpability standard. I think it is reasonable in this particular area, even with the protections, to change the word "knowingly" at an appropriate point.

I will be glad to offer that amendment or, if the Senator would offer his amendment to that, I would urge that the Senate approve it and we could get on with it.

I will be glad to talk to the Senator. We could have worked out this particular part. But, as I say, we did not know this was coming up until it was read. I am sure we could have worked it out.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I do think it is one of the most serious omissions in the bill.

I want to come back in just a moment to the Senator's offer to modify this. But I would like to refer the Senator to the statute he referred me to a moment ago referring to "reckless."

The Senator said "reckless" is codified. He gave me 18, 1001. Here is what it says:

Whoever, in any matter within the jurisdiction of any department or agency of the United States knowingly and willfully falsifies, conceals or covers up by any trick, scheme, or device a material fact or makes any false, fictitious or fraudulent statements or representations, or makes or uses any false writing or document knowing the same to contain any false * * *.

That is the law the Senator said was codified in this bill. But it is not. The term "reckless" is used.

So I am saying to the Senate that I like that law. I think it makes the prosecutor prove his case, as he ought to. I think it protects innocent people, and that they ought to be protected.

The Senator just made an offer a while ago to accept a modification of the amendment. If he would restate that, I will entertain the idea.

Mr. KENNEDY. I am glad to restate it.

If the Senator would take "knowingly" and "willfully" as defined in case law, the Senator has got a bargain.

Mr. BUMPERS. Just simply add that?

Mr. KENNEDY. All I say is, as the Senator knows, the courts interpret these provisions. It is interpreted in many cases. In a number of those cases culpability was defined as "reckless." Those words are there, as defined by case law, as reckless, and that is where we reached it. We were not trying to put a lower or higher standard on this part.

I would like to move beyond these points, if it is agreeable, and take the word "knowingly," at the proper place if that would be acceptable to the Senator and with the understanding that this is done to preserve existing case law. I do not have the particular line reference, but I will suggest the absence of a quorum, and we can try to work it out.

Mr. BUMPERS. I will accept the Senator's modification of "knowingly" if the Senator will accept it also on the perjury sections, 1341 and 1342.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HODGES). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the previous amendment be withdrawn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1157

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask unanimous consent that it be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Arkansas (Mr. BUMPERS) proposes unprinted amendment numbered 1157.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

AMENDMENT OF MR. BUMPERS TO S. 1437

On page 77, line 24, after "he" insert "knowingly".

On page 77, line 35, after "he" insert "knowingly".

On page 78, line 10, after "if" insert "he knowingly"; line 11, after "he" insert "knowingly".

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts and I have talked about this. We have submitted this amendment as a substitute for the one I just withdrew as one which will add the word "knowingly" to both the perjury charge and the false statement charge. It is a little less lengthy but accomplishes the same purpose, and certainly it will satisfy most of the reservations I have about those two sections.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I accept the amendment. I believe that it is basically a restatement of the current law, but I think it perhaps clarifies it, and I move its adoption.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, the amendment is acceptable to us.

Mr. BROOKE. Mr. President, section 1343 provides, among other things, that a person is guilty of an offense if "in a Government matter" he makes "a material oral statement that is false" to a person he knows is "a law enforcement officer" or a person assigned noncriminal investigative responsibility "by statute or regulation, or by the head of a Government agency."

The Bumpers amendment would provide that the false oral statement and all other statements under this section would have to be made knowingly. There are several important reasons for supporting such an amendment.

First, section 1343 goes beyond the present law on false statements and the recommendations of the Brown commission report on that issue. For the first time there is a specific provision making false oral statements made to a law enforcement official punishable. The present false statement statute, 18 U.S.C. 1001, provides:

Whoever in any matter within the jurisdiction of any department or agency of the United States knowingly and willfully falsifies, conceals or covers up by any trick, scheme, or device a material fact, or makes any false, fictitious or fraudulent statements or representations, or makes or uses any false writing or document knowing the same to contain any false, fictitious or fraudulent statement or entry, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

Up to now there has been a conflict among the various circuits as to whether false oral statements should be included. For example, in United States v. Bedore, 455 F. 2d 1109 (9th Cir. 1972) the court of appeals held that the statute was not intended to embrace oral, unsworn statements, unrelated to any claim of declarant to a privilege from the United States or a claim against the United States while in United States v. Adler, 380 F. 2d 917 (2d Cir. 1967), the court of appeals included oral false statements where the defendant voluntarily offered statements which were aimed at initiating criminal investigations against another person.

And the Brown commission report excluded any oral statements unless there is a legal duty to divulge or there is an intent to implicate another person. The report discussed the judicial concern about the apparent coverage of 18 U.S.C. 1001 to include statements made to investigating authorities:

An inquiry might be made of any citizen concerning criminal cases of a minor nature, or even of civil matters of little consequence, and if he willfully falsified his statements, it would be a violation of this statute. It is inconceivable that Congress had any such intent when this portion of the statute was enacted. A literal construction of a statute is not to be resorted to when it would bring about absurd consequences, or flagrant injustices, or produce results not intended by Congress. Paternostro v. United States, 311 F.2d 298, 303 (5th Cir. 1962).

The Brown report went on to state that—

The basic concern is that the use of the statute by agents with the authority to investigate crime generally might subject persons to unlimited questioning, without the procedural safeguards afforded by grand jury investigations, or administrative safeguards afforded by the clear delineation of jurisdiction in other governmental agencies.

In many of those decisions which have held that 18 U.S.C. 1001 covered false oral statements only allowed those oral statements that were volunteered in an attempt to investigate an action against another person, or related to a privilege from the United States, or related to an existent legal duty on the part of the one providing the false statement. United States v. Goldfine, 538 F.2d 815 (9th Cir. 1976) (a privilege received from United States existed); United States v. Adler, 380 F.2d 917 (2d Cir. 1967) (action initiated by defendant); c.f. Friedman v. United States, 374 F.2d 363 (8th Cir. 1967) (where defendant voluntarily gave statement but held not to be within the jurisdiction of the FBI with reference to this section.)

In an attempt to avoid restrictions indicated by the courts to be relevant the proposed law includes the proviso that a statement is safeguarded by the requirement that it be "volunteered or * * * made after the person is advised that making such a statement is an offense." But this is not enough. If oral statements are to be admitted at all, they should be limited strictly to those cases where the individual knowingly made a false oral statement. Only then can the constitutional rights of the individual be adequately protected.

The second major factor supporting the Bumpers amendment is that section 1343 would significantly change the mens rea standard in present law; 18 U.S.C. 1001 makes it a criminal offense, inter alia, for any person "knowingly and willfully" to falsify or conceal a material fact or make any false, fictitious, or fraudulent statements or representations. The proposed S. 1437 provision, section 1343, would change the present mens rea requirements section as follows: First, it would eliminate any need for proof that the accused knew his statement would be used in connection with a Government matter; it would be sufficient that he acted in reckless disregard of the possibility that the statement would be so used; and second, more fundamental, section 1343 would no longer require the Government to prove that the accused knew the statement to be false, the proof of state of mind required would only be that of recklessness.

As a general matter, the culpability level of recklessness is undesirable because criminal liability may attach to the conduct of a person who did not have fair notice that his conduct was unlawful. It is particularly undesirable where the accused may be convicted of making a false statement if he was merely reckless as to the falsity of the statement. If the Government does not have to prove that the accused knew the statement was false, any false statement made in a Government matter could subject the maker to criminal prosecution under this provision. This standard is simply too loose where the stakes are criminal liability.

Second, the loose mens rea requirements are compounded by the broad and nearly open-ended definitions of the conduct which section 1343 would prohibit. Thus, a person comes within the section's prohibitions if he "omits * * * a material fact in a written statement," "submits or invites reliance on a material writing that is false * * * altered, or otherwise lacking in authenticity," "submits or invites reliance on a sample * * * or other object that is misleading in a material respect," or "fraudulently uses a * * * scheme, or device that is misleading in a material respect."

These prohibitions, applicable to any kind of a statement, oral or written, in any Government matter, are limited in their potential coverage only by the ingenuity of Government prosecutors. One result of such a sweeping delegation of prosecutorial authority would likely be to discourage citizens and institutions from coming forward to present information or testimony to Government authorities.

Two cases are cited in the committee report for the proposition that section 1343 reflects existing case law in requiring only recklessness with regard to the falsity of a statement. These cases are United States v. Egenberg, 441 F. 2d 441, 444 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 404 U.S. 994 (1971), and United States v. Clearfield, 358 F. Supp. 564, 574 (E.D. Pa. 1973). Neither case supports the proposition that recklessness alone is sufficient to satisfy the "knowing" and "willful" standard of 18 U.S.C. 1001, and a review of the case law under this statute and others using the same language shows that the interpretation of "knowing" and "willful" in 18 U.S.C. 1001 is not the equivalent of "recklessness" as defined in S. 1437. Section 1343 would clearly accomplish a change in existing law in this regard, by allowing conviction upon proof that the defendant's state of mind with regard to the falsity of his statement was merely reckless.

The prevailing case law under 18 U.S.C. 1001 requires proof of an "intent to deceive or mislead." United States v. Lange, 528 F. 2d 1280, 1286 n. 10 (5th Cir. 1976). See also United States v. Snider, 502 F. 2d 645, 651–652 (4th Cir. 1974); United States v. Smith, 523 F. 2d 771 (5th Cir. 1975). The third circuit interprets 18 U.S.C. 1001 to require "proof of an evil motive." United States v. Weiler, 385 F. 2d 63, 67 (3d Cir. 1967). The eighth circuit, construing the terms "knowingly and willfully" in a false-statement prosecution under 15 U.S.C. 1717 (Interstate Land Sales Act), referred to decisions construing 18 U.S.C. 1001 and concluded that "knowingly" means "that the defendant must have a 'certain and clear perception of the falsity of the claim made.'" United States v. Steinhilber, 484 F. 2d 386, 390 (8th Cir. 1973).

The cases cited by the report—United States against Egenberg and United States against Clearfield—are not contrary to this mainstream case law but fully consistent with it. Each deals with the recognized principle that a jury may convict a defendant of knowing falsehood even though there is no direct evidence of his knowledge. As in any other case, the jury may rely on circumstantial evidence to conclude that the defendant had the requisite knowledge. The factual context of Egenberg shows that no general rule of mere recklessness was intended:

> Appellant claims that there was insufficient evidence to sustain a conviction on the charge of falsely stating on Sisten Ehrling's return of April 17, 1965 that Ehrling did not intend to return to the United States. The government provided that appellant had examined Ehrling's file at Columbia Artists Management, Inc., and that this file contained several contracts obligating Ehrling to return to the United States before the end of 1965. The court correctly charged that in order to convict under 18 U.S.C. Section 1001 (1964) the jury need only find that the defendant acted with reckless disregard of whether the statement * * * was true or that appellant acted with a conscious purpose to avoid learning the truth. See United States v. Abrams, 427 F. 2d 86, 91 (2d Cir. 1970)." (441 F. 2d at 444).

A later decision of the second circuit makes the intent of Egenberg even clearer. In United States v. Hanlon, 548 F. 2d 1096 (2d Cir. 1977), the court defined the issue: "The crucial element in this case was guilty knowledge on the part of the defendants." (548 F. 2d at 1100.) The court then discussed the trial court's charge on guilty knowledge, which had allowed the jury to attribute to the defendant knowledge of facts that were obvious to him. The second circuit upheld the conviction, interpreting the trial judge's charge to be proper on a theory of "conscious avoidance."

> It is settled law that a finding of guilty knowledge may not be avoided by a showing that the defendant closed his eyes to what was going on about him; "see no evil" is not a maxim in which the criminal defendant should take any comfort. United States v. Bernstein, 533 F. 2d 775, 796–98 (2d Cir. 1976); United States v. Jewel, 532 F. 2d 697, (9th Cir. 1976) (en banc). See Leary v. United States, 395 U.S. 6, 46, 89 S. Ct. 1532, 23 L.Ed 2d 57 (1969); American Law Institute Model Penal Code Section 2.02(7) (Proposed Official Draft 1962). There can be no doubt that the "conscious avoidance" standard set forth in Judge Pollack's charge was entirely proper. (548 F. 2d at 1101.)

The appellate court, however, was highly critical of the trial judge's use of the term "reckless"—

> We are troubled, however, by the repeated use of the term "reckless." This Court has previously had occasion to criticize the use of this "technical and confusing" term. United States v. Gentile, supra, 530 F. 2d at 470; United States v. Bright, supra, see United States v. Sarantos, supra. The distinction between recklessness and negligence is elusive enough for even the most respected legal scholars. See Prosser on Torts, 32, 184–86 (4th ed. 1971). It follows that to the layman on the jury, it might prove a significant source of confusion. It is thus preferable, in the cases such as this, to omit the use of the term. It adds nothing to the "conscious avoidance" language which we have approved, and might tend to mislead the jury. We are satisfied that, in this case the challenged portion of the charge was not error, plain or otherwise. However, should trial courts continue to employ this disfavored language, we will not hesitate to take appropriate corrective measures. (Id. at 1101–1102.)

The quoted language leaves no room to doubt that the second circuit has not embraced the notion that the mental elements "knowing" and "willful" may be satisfied by simple proof that a defendant recklessly disregarded a possibility that his statement was false.

Therefore, it is necessary that the Senate add the provision that false statements would have to be made knowingly.

Mr. President, I urge the Senate to adopt the Bumpers amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

Mr. ALLEN. I yield.

Mr. BUMPERS. I make one statement as a sort of caveat to the Senate about this whole subject of false statements.

It is the section in here that troubles me a great deal because I have seen too many overzealous prosecutors, and I know what they can do with an omission in the drafting of laws.

But on this 7-day recantation, which has been alluded to, I shall point out one thing to the Senate.

It is true that he must know that the person he is talking to is an officer, a law enforcement officer, and now he must knowingly, he must know that he makes a false statement, which takes care of 90 percent of my concern. But under the bill I invite the Senate's attention to pages 78 to 79 there on false statements. He does not have an automatic 7 days in which to recant. He has a maximum of 7 days in which to recant, but he must do so before it has become obvious that his falsification might be exposed and before the Government has been misled, which means that the prosecutor can say. "It is too late to recant because we had another witness over here that was just about to expose you. It is too late to recant because we have already started pursuing a line of questioning with other folks because of your misrepresentation or your omission."

Finally, I want to make two other points about that section. It provides that a person can be charged not because the Government was misled, not because the statement is admissible in court, but that the person making the statement might have been exposed, that the statement could—not necessarily did—have misled, and even if the statement was not admissible.

I am telling the Senate that we are getting terribly lax and indifferent when it comes to protecting the innocent people in this country, and I rise to simply point this out because I want to refer back to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD one day, and say, "I told you so." I am going to predict that we will see a rash of harassing cases across this country in the next decade as a result of the language in that provision.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1158

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask unanimous consent that it may be considered at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Alabama (Mr. ALLEN) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1158.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 331, after line 29, insert the following new subdivision:

"'(d) Modification of a Sentence.—The court may reduce a sentence, including a reduction to probation pursuant to the provisions applicable to the initial imposition of the sentence, within 120 days after the sentence is imposed, unless a notice of appeal has been filed for review of the sentence under 18 U.S.C. 3725.

Mr. ALLEN. This amendment is designed to continue the present power of the court to modify a sentence imposed by reducing it so long as such modification is made during a 120-day period following the imposition of the sentence. Additionally, the amendment would permit a judge to reduce a sentence from a term of imprisonment to probation only or to a combination of probation and a sentence of imprisonment, this obviously consistent with an overall reduction in the original sentence imposed. Unfortunately, present case law does not permit a judge to reduce a sentence of imprisonment to probation only or to a combination of probation and a term of imprisonment, and my amendment would correct the problems created by that decisional court-made law.

Mr. President, I have received a letter, dated January 16, 1978, from one of the distinguished district judges in the northern district of Alabama, calling my attention by reference to a letter from Judge J. Foy Guin, Jr., to Hon. JAMES O. EASTLAND, by letter of the same date, and I ask unanimous consent that these letters be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Re: S–1437, New Federal Criminal Code.
Hon. JAMES B. ALLEN,
U.S. Senator, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR JIM: I have written the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee and am enclosing a copy of that letter, stating my views concerning the proposed new criminal code. The bill in the Senate is S–1437. I do not know the number in the House.

I think it would be a serious mistake to eliminate the authority of a sentencing judge to reduce a sentence, as is presently provided by law.

I also think it would be a serious mistake to make a drastic change in the present system of parole so as effectively to substitute a system of relatively short sentences without, usually, parole supervision after release for the present system which would put most prisoners back into society at about the same time but leave them under parole restraints and supervision for many years. This keeps a "handle" on the parolee which I think is not only valuable but necessary.

With very best wishes to you and yours for the new year.

Sincerely,

J. FOY GUIN, Jr.,
Judge.

U.S. DISTRICT COURT, NORTHERN DISTRICT OF ALABAMA,
Birmingham, Ala., January 16, 1978.

Re: S–1437 New Federal Criminal Code.
Hon. JAMES O. EASTLAND,
Chairman, Senate Judiciary Committee, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR EASTLAND: I was interviewed recently for about two hours by a representative of G.A.O., seeking my views on the sentencing and parole provisions in particular of the proposed new federal criminal code. I appreciate very much the Congress seeking the views of the judiciary, and especially appreciate the opportunity to discuss the matter in person with the G.A.O. representative. I will not restate here the views I stated in that lengthy interview, since I know you have access to them in his report.

I am concerned about two things which have been mentioned in "The Third Branch," the December 1977 issue, this being the bulletin of the federal courts, published by the Administrative Office and the Federal Judicial Center and circulated to all federal judges. There is an article on page nine attempting to summarize the provisions of S–1437 and of the companion bill in the House, the number of which is not known to me. I read this article after the G.A.O. interview, and it has two comments I find disturbing.

The article says that the bill will amend Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 35 so as to eliminate the present power of the sentencing judge merely to reduce a sentence within 120 days after the sentence is imposed. The judge will only retain the power to correct a sentence imposed in an illegal manner or to correct a sentence on remand when the appellate court has determined that it is clearly unreasonable. I think it is a mistake to take away from the sentencing judge this power. Frequently, on reflection, a judge decides that he ought to make a change in a sentence he has imposed. It will add greatly to the burden of a sentencing judge if he is not allowed the right to rethink his sentence and make what he considers to be an appropriate correction of it. This change would put us in the position of the king of the Medes and Persians who was forced to throw his friend Daniel into the lion's den because once he had pronounced something he could not take it back. Every judge ought to have the right to reconsider what he has done for an appropriate length of time. On the civil side of the court I get many motions for reconsideration and have granted several. In fact, the granting of a motion for reconsideration on the civil side by me is not at all uncommon. It is more common than the granting of similar motions on the criminal side, but I have granted criminal motions to reconsider sentences and feel very distressed that the power to reconsider what I have done is about to be taken away from me on the criminal side. I just don't think I'm so perfect that I never have to reconsider a sentence. Nor do I think any other judge is that perfect. I do appeal to you to allow us to continue to have this power to reconsider our sentences and reduce them within 120 days, as is provided by present law.

The other proposed change which the article discusses is not really made very clear by the article. I refer to the change in the parole system. The article indicates that a prisoner may be placed on parole upon his release even though he has served his full term. It also indicates that the judge can provide for early release eligibility in his sentence, which evidently will require his release at that time rather than simply making it possible for the Parole Commission to give him consideration at the early release date stated in the sentence. The article says parole will be redefined as a period of supervision in addition to the sentence. Consequently, my remarks may not be applicable, because I may not fully understand what is planned.

If I do understand the proposed changes in the system, parole will be used only in exceptional circumstances. I believe the approach is to provide for sentences which will be fully served without, usually, an expectation of early release on parole unless specifically provided in the judge's sentence.

I do like the idea of being able to provide for an early release date in my sentence which will carry more weight than it presently does. On the other hand, the caseworkers in the prison are able to judge much better than I whether a prisoner is ready for release. I have to look to the future and try to guess what kind of changes the prisoner will make, and I am not gifted with the power of prophecy. The caseworkers, operating as a team, in the various prisons have impressed me with their knowledgeability. They know prisoners try to fool them and they are hard to fool. I would rather the decision were made by the caseworker team after observing the prisoner in the institution than for me to make it in advance, as a binding decision on my part. I think the present Parole Commission does not give enough weight to the opinions of caseworkers and has been too rigidly bound to its guidelines. I think they have tended to release prisoners on a slide rule basis, rather than a subjective human analysis of the prisoner and his behavior. I realize that subjective judgments are not in fashion presently among many people, but it has been my experience that the only way to predict human behavior is subjectively. It may not be a perfect process, but it is the only way. This is not to imply that some objective standards are not useful in making a subjective judgment.

In my G.A.O. interview I expressed some views recommending change in the present guideline system of the Parole Commission. On the other hand, I strongly urged that the Commission not be abolished and that we not substitute a system of relatively short sentences without parole for a system of longer sentences which assume that at some point, assuming good behavior predictive of further future good behavior, there would be a release on parole prior to the end of the sentence in a great majority of cases. I admit that the present system can be criticized. I believe, however, that there is more to criticize in what I perceive as the proposed new system.

I have read widely on this subject since being appointed almost five years ago, because I understand the seriousness of my task in sentencing people. I am a strong believer in probation for those who are entitled to it, and the probationers of this court have succeeded in over 95 percent of the cases since I have been on the court in completing their probationary terms successfully. In fact, the record of the court for 1964 through 1974 was 98 percent successful completion! I have never refused probation to a defendant who had a favorable recommendation from a probation officer of this court because of the tremendous success we have had, as indicated by these figures. On the other hand, I have imposed some very long sentences in appropriate cases. There are five judges, including one senior judge, of this court imposing criminal sentences. Of the five, over the past two years I have averaged longer sentences than any other judge. The disparity is not great, and all of us are around the national median, but I do wish to point out that I am not "soft" on the subject. I believe in protecting the public. I also know from experience that many people convicted in my court can be rehabilitated, and know of specific examples of those who have. This is true especially of those placed on probation but is also true of many of those sent to prison.

In other words, I have not completely given up on rehabilitation, athough I am not blind to the fact that there are some people who simply need to be "warehoused" and kept out of society. I have identified these "warehouse" cases and have given them very long sentences, which raises my average and makes me appear to be the hardest sentencing judge on this court.

I say this by way of background. I believe there is rehabilitative benefit in keeping a man on parole after he is released from prison. I also believe there is benefit to society by keeping him in fear of having to go back. He is less likely to commit a crime if he is under supervision and afraid of having to go back. In other words, I would rather see a man get a 15-year sentence with release on parole after five years and 10 years continuous supervision than to see him get a five-year sentence, all of which he must serve, but with no continuous supervision after his release. I use these figures only for illustration. It is my fear that the sentencing commission will put such strictures upon us that the senences which will actually result from this new system will be relatively short and the beneficial aspects of parole in the present system will be virtually eliminated.

I hope I have understood the article incorrectly. If I have, then this part of my letter may be ignored. If, on the other hand, I have understood it correctly, I do appeal for a reconsideration of the basic approach to the parole system contemplated by this bill.

Sincerely,

J. Foy Guin, Jr.

P.S.—Not only do I plead that the 120-day sentence reduction provision be retained—I strongly urge that the Congress permit this to be extended to judgments of modification reducing a sentence to probation or to a sentence including probation, such as a split sentence. The Supreme Court has held twice that a judge cannot modify a sentence so as to impose probation. On reconsideration of a sentence the judge should have the full panoply of the options that he has initially, including the right to impose probation in place of custodial sentence or to impose a split sentence, which is a combination of custodial sentence with probation.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I call attention to one paragraph which has reference to the amendment that I have offered.

Not only do I plead that the 120-day sentence reduction provision be retained—I strongly urge that the Congress permit this to be extended to judgments of modification reducing a sentence to probation or to a sentence including probation, such as a split sentence. The Supreme Court has held twice that a judge cannot modify a sentence so as to impose probation. On reconsideration of a sentence the judge should have the full panoply of the options that he has initially, including the right to impose probation in place of custodial sentence or to impose a split sentence, which is a combination of custodial sentence with probation.

This amendment would allow the court to reduce a sentence within 120 days after the sentence is imposed, unless a notice of appeal has been filed for review of the sentence under section 3725.

I have discussed this matter with the distinguished manager of the bill, and I understand that he is agreeable to accepting the amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, this would restore current law. The reason it was dropped is because of the guidelines, which give us a sense of predictability and certainty not found today. The ability to appeal if the sentence goes below or above the guidelines and to give the right of appeal even within the guidelines if the guidelines have been wrongfully applied, make a motion to reduce unnecessary.

Now, the Senator would permit up to 120 days for reduction by the same sentencing officer. As I understand, this is so only if there has not been a filing for an appeal.

Mr. ALLEN. That is correct.

Mr. KENNEDY. I have no objection to it. It is an additional protection for the defendant, but I do not think—given the fact that we will have guidelines—that it is really necessary. But I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, the amendment is acceptable to us.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

The amendment was agreed to.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1159

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I call up an unprinted amendment and ask unanimous consent that it be in order to be considered at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection it is so ordered. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Utah (Mr. Hatch), for himself and Mr. Helms, proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1159.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 171, line 27, after the semicolon add the following language:
"and shall include non-profit means of mass communication;".

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, what this amendment does is close one of the loopholes of the obscenity part of the statute. Under the definition of "commercially disseminate" it means to disseminate for profit. We would add at this point that it should include nonprofit means of mass communications as well, which will close one of the loopholes we were able to find today.

I understand both the majority manager and the minority manager will accept the amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. We have no objection. Obviously, the definition of "commercially disseminate" should apply to both the profit and nonprofit networks.

Mr. THURMOND. We have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. ALLEN. I would appreciate if the distinguished manager of the bill would engage in a short colloquy with respect to the introduction of an amendment I have prepared. I would like to inquire of the distinguished manager of the bill inasmuch as the bill in its very first section here, section 101, amends title 18, and the amendment is, in effect, a repeal because it says "title 18 of the United States Code which may be cited as '18 U.S.C. —' or as 'Federal Criminal Code —,' is amended to read as follows," so that any provision of title 18, which is the section on Federal crimes, if every single provision of title 18 is repealed, except to the extent that it is carried forward in S. 1437, because title 18 will be no more except as it is brought forward in this bill, I would like to ask the distinguished manager of the bill a question.

I think it is very important that this information be elicited. I would like to ask the manager of the bill how many separate acts embodied in title 18 were dropped from S. 1437, and if the Senator does have that information please supply the identification of the acts which were not carried forward in S. 1437?

I might state I have had called to my attention the fact that the Logan Act, which prevents private citizens from carrying on foreign relations negotiations with foreign countries is dropped from S. 1437, it is not carried forward.

Since that is an important omission I am just wondering how many other omissions there are.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, the best estimate we have is that approximately 10 to 12 crimes are repealed, archaic provisions such as interfering with a government carrier pigeon, seducing a female passenger aboard a ship, the Logan Act, and so forth.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator thinks that ought to be permitted?

Mr. KENNEDY. Is the Senator offering an amendment to restore it?

[Laughter].

This is the type of section eliminated.

I want to point out that with regard to the Logan Act, that was agreed to be taken out of S. 1 and the legislation which preceded S. 1; it is not a part of the agreement I entered into with Senator McClellan.

It was urged upon us by the Justice Department. It has been on the books since 1799, and they urged us to strike it. I think it should be stricken.

Mr. ALLEN. Would the Senator be kind enough for the Record to insert a list of the acts——

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. A list of the provisions of title 18 that were not brought forward in S. 1437?

Mr. KENNEDY. I will do so as soon as a comprehensive list can be prepared.

Mr. President, before proceeding further, I wish to comment further on the amendment of Mr. HUDDLESTON's, agreed to last week which deals with the witness protectio program.

The amendment would permit a plaintiff in a civil suit brought against a relocated witness for a cause of action arising before the witness was relocated to use the Attorney General to serve process on the witness so that the suit can go forward. In addition, if a judgment results and the Attorney General determines that reasonable efforts to satisfy the judgment are not being made by the witness, then the Attorney General, in his discretion after weighing the danger that could result to the witness, may release his new name and location to the plaintiff for collection purposes.

The amendment seeks to draw a balance between the importance to law enforcement of the witness relocation program and the need to protect otherwise innocent civil litigants who are left with no one to sue. The Department of Justice wishes to protect those in its relocation program while at the same time not wishing to have the program misused by the relocated witnesses to avoid paying their just debts.

This amendment draws the balance adequately. It permits the plaintiff to serve process against the witness who can then adequately defend himself while still shielded under the relocation program. When it comes to satisfying the judgment, if one is rendered against the relocated person, he would be expected to behave like any other citizen. Only if he fails to make reasonable efforts to satisfy the judgment will the Attorney General consider further action. Here is the heart of the amendment. It grants discretion to the Attorney General to release the identity and location of the witness to the plaintiff so that he may collect from a recalcitrant judgment debtor.

However, that discretion is to be exercised only after an examination of the risks to the life and safety of the relocated person. If the risk of retaliating action is too great then the identity must remain secret; quite bluntly the right to property and money cannot be raised above the right to life. Moreover, if the relocated witness is penniless there is no reason to release his new name and endanger him. The Attorney General must take care that those seeking to kill a witness who has testified against them cannot pursue a sham civil action to judgment as a vehicle for finding the witness.

If the danger has passed, and if the safety of the witness can be assured, then it is expected that the discretion of the Attorney General will be exercised in favor of release. The threat of release of the new identity is also a powerful weapon for the Attorney General to use to persuade the judgment debtor to make reasonable efforts to satisfy the judgment.

As long as the ultimate decision to release the new identity is left to the Attorney General's discretion to be exercised in terms of the ultimate safety of the relocated person, then the amendment is acceptable.

I would also like to clarify the record as to the application of the extortion amendment, No. 1085, passed by the Senate on January 19. That amendment makes clear that "the pendency of a labor dispute, the outcome of which could result in the obtaining of employment benefits by" an individual committing an act of damage is not, in and of itself, probative of extortion. The amendment is intended to avoid an implication that if violence occurs incidental to a labor dispute, the violence could be attributed to the union as a tactic for extortion where there was no evidence that that was the purpose of the violent conduct. The amendment means that more than the mere coincidence of a labor dispute and violence is needed to show that violence was intended to be a means of extorting anything from the employer. A case of extortion could not be proved in a labor dispute situation just because fighting or other violence occurs—this is the intent of the amendment.

In fact, the Government would not even attempt to prosecute as extortion most cases of violence associated with a labor dispute. The amendment is a recognition that tempers often flare in labor dispute situations. In a case where there was evidence that there was an agreement among people involved in the labor dispute to use violence against the employer as a means of achieving the goals of the labor union, such as dynamiting a plant, that evidence would establish a prima facie case.

In the absence of such evidence, a defendant would be entitled to dismissal of the case. In fact, in the absence of such evidence, such matters should be left to the States, which are fully capable of dealing with disorderly conduct, assault, property destruction, and other lesser crimes. And that is what these minor offenses are in the absence of a plan or conspiracy to extort.

Mr. President, one other matter. In light of questions that have been raised as to the effect of the modification of the language of the present 18 U.S.C. 1961 by section 1806(e), I wish to stress that under the code we intend the courts to follow the limiting gloss on the present law stated by Judge Pierce in United States v. Stofsky, 409 F. Supp. 609 (S.D.N.Y.):

> This court therefore construes the word "pattern" as including a requirement that the racketeering acts must have been connected with each other by some common scheme, plan, or motive so as to constitute a pattern and not simply a series of disconnected acts.

Moreover, it should also be noted in this connection that while the word "conducts" in section 1802 is, as stated in the committee report—page 776—to be construed "broadly," it does not include acts by officers and employees for their own financial benefit which do not increase their domination of the organization's affairs or further unlawful activity by the organization.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I would like to ask the distinguished floor manager several questions which have been raised by members of the press who have expressed some concerns over certain provisions of S. 1437.

Mr. KENNEDY. I will be glad to respond to the Senator's questions.

Mr. CRANSTON. I would like to ask the floor manager a question regarding section 1311, hindering law enforcement. Specifically, paragraph (1)(D) of subsection (a) which is an offense for altering, destroying, concealing a record or document if the conduct is done to interfere with or hinder the discovery, apprehension, prosecution, conviction, or punishment of another person when the actor knows that the other person has committed a crime or is charged with or is being sought for a crime. The question is: would a reporter be guilty of concealing a document containing evidence of unlawful conduct if he did not turn in his notes regarding Government corruption which he had obtained in an interview with a confidential source?

Mr. KENNEDY. No. The formulation of this offense including the altering, destroying, or concealing of evidence is based upon the Model Penal Code and the Brown Commission. Its purpose is to prohibit such things as the destruction or alteration of the Watergate tapes, attempts to "deep six" evidence and other such conduct. There is no evidence that the Brown Commission intended this offense to interfere with the right of reporters to maintain the confidentiality of their notes. As used in this offense, concealing requires some affirmative conduct so it would not interfere with the ability of investigative reporters to protect the confidentiality of their sources.

Mr. CRANSTON. Would a reporter be guilty of concealing if, under persistent questioning by Federal investigators, he refused to divulge the identity of a source or a suspect or refused to make his notes and other material available?

Mr. KENNEDY. No. So long as his conduct consists of keeping silent on the subject, the reporter has not engaged in conduct constituting concealing.

Mr. CRANSTON. Would a reporter be guilty of an offense if he destroyed his notes or erased tapes or other work product knowing that these contained evidence sought by law enforcement agencies?

Mr. KENNEDY. No, unless the evidence had been subpenaed or otherwise lawfully requested. And, if the reporter destroyed his notes in the normal course of his work and did not destroy them with the intent to prevent law enforcement agencies from obtaining them through proper process, no offense would have been committed since the requisite intent was absent.

Mr. CRANSTON. I thank the distinguished floor manager.

Does section 1324, an offense for retaliating against a witness, apply to a newspaper which reports the testimony of a witness. Specifically, subsection (a)(2) makes it an offense to "improperly" subject another person to economic loss or injury to his business because a person has testified as a witness in an official proceeding. Would the press be subject to this offense if publication of the witness' testimony, which included evidence of his own unlawful conduct, caused economic loss to the witness?

Mr. KENNEDY. No. It is not "improper" to publish information including the testimony of a witness even if such publication causes humiliation or economic loss to the witness. The offense is designed and intended to prohibit retaliation against a witness on account of his appearance as a witness. In a situation of publication by a newspaper of a witness' testimony, the newspaper would not be retaliating for his appearance as a witness, but merely publishing information made available through the witness' testimony. This is precisely why the term "improperly" is included in the offense.

Let me give some examples of what this offense would apply to. First, if a public servant testified before Congress concerning corruption in a Government agency or cost overruns on a Government project, it would be an offense if his superiors discharged such a person or denied him promotion because of his appearance to give testimony which was embarrassing to the agency. Another example might be a situation where a farmer reported kickbacks given by the operators of a grain elevator to grain inspectors and the subsequent cancellation and breach of a contract between the grain elevator and the farmer because of his testimony.

Mr. CRANSTON. I would like to ask another question of clarification. The contempt section provides a specific defense for gag orders. Would a reporter be able to claim a reporter's privilege?

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes. Section 1331, contempt must be read together with section 1333 refusal to testify which provides an affirmative defense if information is privileged. Nothing in the code is intended to preclude the judicial development and recognition of a newman's privilege and the specific privilege for gag orders in section 1331 is not intended to override any privilege that a witness may have under the law. The bill is silent on this.

It is also important to note that section 104 states that the code is not intended to affect the civil contempt authority of courts which they may choose to utilize in those cases where there is a good faith claim of privilege.

Mr. CRANSTON. Does either section 1331, contempt, or section 1333, refusing to testify, eliminate any right of a newsman to claim a privilege for confidential information?

Mr. KENNEDY. No. Section 1331 in general, simply restates the existing contempt power in section 401 of title 18. It would not alter or diminish the right of a newsman to claim a privilege.

Second, section 1333 specifically provides an affirmative defense if a witness has a privilege not to testify. This is intended to cover lawyer-client, doctor-patient, and other such privileges. In 1974, when Congress enacted the Federal rules of evidence, it included rule 501, which left the recognition and development of privileges up to the courts. Nothing in section 1333 would alter this authority. A number of first amendment commentators have concluded that a qualified newsman's privilege is emerging. This is based on such civil cases as Baker v. F & F Investment, 470 F.2d 778 (2 Cir. 1972), cert. denied, 411 U.S. 966 (1973), and Cervantes v. Time, Inc., 464 F.2d 968 (8th Cir. 1972) cert. denied 409 U.S. 1125 (1973). There have been a few Federal criminal cases directly addressing this point subsequent to Branzberg, but in one notable State case. Justice Poff of the Virginia Supreme Court, a former Congressman and member of the Brown Commission, recognized a privilege. See Brown v. Commonwealth, 204 S.E. 2d 429 (1974), cert. denied 419 U.S. 966 (1974).

In sum, the answer is that nothing in the code would alter or eliminate any privilege which a reporter is entitled to claim, nor the authority of the courts to continue to develop the law in this area.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I would like to express a concern that I have with section 1525 of this bill. That section would provide for criminal penalties for the release by Government employees of certain information where confidential treatment of that information is mandated by another statute, regulation, rule, or order.

The area of confidential treatment of information in government files is currently a complex and confusing one. There already is a statute on the books—18 U.S.C. 1905—that prohibits the release of confidential information by government employees on pain of criminal penalties, and this bill preserves that section. A large number of other statutes also prohibit individual agencies from releasing certain types of confidential data in their files.

Further, it has been held by some courts that the exemptions from mandatory disclosure contained in the Freedom of Information Act also prohibit the release of certain information. Both 18 U.S.C. 1905 and the Freedom of Information Act exemptions have been cited by those who, for one reason or another, wish to restrict the release of information in Government files, and the court decisions interpreting those sections have been contradictory.

I believe that Congress should carefully review the whole subject of Government information policy on information received by the Government as confidential with a view toward clearing up present ambiguities, and making available to the public as much information as possible, while protecting from disclosure information that is legitimately entitled to confidential treatment. I am concerned that the addition of yet another confidentiality statute proposed by section 1525 of the bill to the current law, without an adequate analysis of the relationship between that section, section 1905, the Freedom of Information Act, and prohibitions on individual agencies, may further confuse an already confusing area.

Although I do not propose to offer an amendment to strike section 1525, I would hope that the conferees will consider carefully whether or not there is a need for this additional section, and will spell out in detail how this section relates to existing law. I believe that the public interest will best be served if the law enables all interested parties to know with greater certainty what information is public, and what information is properly confidential and not to be released.

In the event that neither the House committee in their deliberations on this bill nor the conferees address the question that I have raised here, I would consider requesting the Governmental Affairs Committee to look into this matter in detail.

Mr. ALLEN. I have only one more amendment, in view of the Senator's explanation. I will not offer it at this time. I have only one more amendment, and that is to reinsert the provisions of the Logan Act. The Logan Act provides that a private individual may not carry on negotiations with a foreign government with regard to the foreign relations policy of the U.S. Government.

To knock this act out or to fail to bring it forward would, in effect, not make every man a king, as was the cry of some candidates of the past, some public figures of the past, but it would make every man a secretary of state. So I do not believe we need to have millions of secretaries of state running about carrying on foreign negotiations with foreign governments.

They say, "Well, there have not been any prosecutions under it." I believe it is a deterrent.

I was talking with one of the distinguished Senators who went down to Panama, and he said before going down he called the President of the United States and asked him to send someone down with his part to represent the State Department. He did not want to be charged with carrying on foreign relations negotiations.

I do believe it will serve as a deterrent against having private citizens carry on or seek to carry on negotiations of a foreign relations nature with foreign governments.

I believe that is the prerogative of the President of the United States and the State Department, subject to the control of Congress in approval of treaties by the Senate, and the power of the purse that Congress has.

That is the only amendment I have remaining, and on the adoption of that amendment I would offer no further amendments and would not seek to see the bill carried over for another day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, much as I would like to move the process forward, I would have to resist this amendment.

This provision has been on the books since 1799, and the Justice Department tells me that there has not been one prosecution under it. Not one. They say it is one of the most antiquated provisions in the current code. They asked Senator McClellan, Senator Hruska, and the rest of us to take it out.

If we talk about the opportunities for mischief in terms of governmental prosecution, I look at the Logan Act. Businessmen or laborers or commercial interests may visit different countries, trying to work out commercial agreements with another nation. I mean there are a thousand different fact situations where this particular provision, in the wrong hands, could be abused.

I think the most compelling factor for its repeal, Mr. President, is that it has been on the books since 1799 and has never been used. But it still lies there. This amendment is strongly recommended by the Justice Department. I think, in a recodification of the criminal code, sentimentality about a particular provision, "the good old Logan Act," has no place. We are either serious in terms of trying to deal with these issues, or not.

I respect the sincerity of the Senator from Alabama on this issue, but I feel that we should repeal it. I am reminded that in the report is says:

Although the Act enjoys a venerable history dating from 1799, it has not been used for prosecution and is constitutionally suspect, both on grounds of vagueness and undue interference with free speech.

On those bases, Mr. President, I would hope that the amendment would be defeated.

Can we have a voice vote?

Mr. ALLEN. I have not offered it yet.

Mr. KENNEDY. Oh, I see. I thought the Senator had.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, what is the pending amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 78 at line 15.

Mr. ALLEN. I move the adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to, as follows:

On page 78, line 15, after "assigned" insert "noncriminal";

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next committee amendment.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

On page 78, line 19, after "and" insert "in fact";

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I wonder if the manager of the bill would explain the amendment. I think the Senate would be interested in knowing what it is.

Mr. KENNEDY. Is it on page 79, did I understand?

Mr. KENNEDY. For clarification. The amendment on line 19 is to clarify the words that follow it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to. The clerk will state the next committee amendment.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

On page 78, line 23, after "omits" insert "a material fact necessary to make a written statement not misleading,";

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum. This will be a live quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold that just one moment?

Mr. KENNEDY. I withhold it.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, as we conclude consideration of S. 1437, it is well to remember that many Senators who took an active part in this debate were not notified that the bill would be considered until 2 days before it was taken up. Many Senators had only 1 or 2 days' notice to consider the many detailed and technical provisions of this bill which contains more than 280 pages of criminal laws—laws by which millions of Americans may one day have the legality of their conduct measured.

Mr. President, although codification and revision of the Federal Criminal Code has been a goal of the Senate for some time and many States have already codified their criminal laws, the clear lesson of this process is that codification is not automatically reform and revision is not automatically improvement. The provisions contained in this bill affect Americans' fundamental civil, political, economic, and constitutional rights. Through this code the U.S. Government seeks to fulfill its responsibility to protect and preserve the life, liberty, and property of its citizens.

In so doing, it is essential that Congress maintain the proper perspective regarding the role of the National Government in our delicate federal system. Historically, the primary responsibility for the protection of people from criminal activity has rested with the States. Cautious exceptions to this primary State jurisdiction were made over time, but with an ever-watchful eye toward the possibility of Federal preemption in the area of criminal law and an accompanying national police force.

In considering this bill, I believe we have not been cautious enough regarding the large increases in Federal jurisdiction which it establishes. We have not been jealous enough, as representatives of the States, of the primacy of State jurisdiction in the criminal law. Furthermore, we have failed to take the careful, systematic analysis of the provisions of this bill, which I believe our responsibility to preserve the freedoms of Americans requires. Therefore, when S. 1437 is considered for final passage, I must vote against it.

We have considered S. 1437 for more than a week beyond what was originally scheduled. During this time the Senate has approved important changes in the bill to protect the liberties of Americans.

We provided that local areas could apply their own standards of obscenity in accord with recent Supreme Court rulings regarding the dissemination of obscene materials.

We sought to protect communities from criminal violence by permitting judges to deny pretrial release to persons charged with serious crimes such as rape, kidnapping, armed robbery, when those persons pose a continuing danger to the community.

We maintained the traditional common law rule to protect innocent defendants from overly broad criminal laws by specifying that criminal statutes be strictly construed with ambiguities interpreted in favor of the defendant.

We rejected a de facto Gun Control Act proposed in the bill which would have imposed a 2-year mandatory prison sentence for possession of a firearm during the commission of a Federal crime. For example, until amended, a hunter arrested for reckless driving on Federal property, and found to have his shotgun in his car, would have been subject to the 2-year mandatory sentence for "possession of a firearm" during the commission of a misdemeanor.

During the past several days much has been done to correct deficiencies in S. 1437, yet substantial defects remain in the bill.

The bill makes it a crime to make a false oral statement to a law enforcement or other Government official, even without the presence of an attorney or a corroborating witness. Regardless of legislative history attempting to explain this provision, it nevertheless would give broad power to FBI agents, OSHA investigators, IRS and customs officials and many other Federal investigators. The addition of the word "knowingly" improves the provision, but by no means sufficiently. Prosecution of this offense invites abuse by setting up a "my word against yours" situation where the defendant and the Federal official are the only witnesses. Finally, unlike present law, this provision would make persons criminally liable for honest mistakes, since it does not require a finding that the defendant made an "intentionally" false statement.

The National Commission on Reform of Federal Criminal Laws recommended that this provision apply only to official Government proceedings, and to statements relating to such violations as false fire alarms, bomb scares, and incrimination of innocent people. Unfortunately, the bill does not reflect the Commission's advice.

Elsewhere, the bill subjects businessmen to criminal liability for honest mistakes and unintentional violations of very technical and complicated laws involving securities and investments. Many of these laws presently require an intentional violation before a businessman may be arrested and criminal proceedings begun.

The bill also grants broad authorization to the Internal Revenue Service to use paid informants in obtaining criminal charges against taxpayers. Late last year, an extensive Government Accounting Office report found substantial misuse of informants by the IRS. Although the use of informants is important in cases regarding organized crime, the serious risks to all taxpayers' rights—which the use of informers poses—require strong controls, not the broad authorization this bill establishes.

The bill repeals present Federal law making it a crime to advocate the violent overthrow of the Government. In light of the rigorous standards and supervision which the Supreme Court has given this law to protect academic or innocent speech not intended to produce violence or subversive activity, it is difficult to understand why it should be summarily repealed.

The bill provides defenses to pornographers which may undermine recent Supreme Court decisions enabling local communities to protect themselves from obscene materials; see for example, Smith v. United States 45 L. W. 4495 (1977).

The bill repeals the present Federal sanctions against engaging in prostitution on U.S. military bases.

It greatly increases the power and discretion of prosecuting attorneys by establishing such criminal laws as "Section 1623, Criminal Restraint—A person is guilty of an offense if he restrains another person." What are the implications of that section, Mr. President?

Organizations so diverse as the American Civil Liberties Union and the Americans for Constitutional Action have voiced concern about procedural aspects of the bill as well as the definitions of many crimes.

Furthermore, the sentencing mechanism which the bill seeks to establish is a novel one representing a major departure from existing practice. Presently, several States have instituted new sentencing procedures and standards which have not yet been proven by experience. I believe that it would be wiser to study the results of these State initiatives before enacting such a substantial redirection of the Federal sentencing system. Very little time has been spent during the past several days discussing the merits and potential risks in adopting the proposed sentencing plan.

Mr. President, we have not squarely faced issues such as the substantial increase in Federal jurisdiction; the increase in prosecutorial discretion; the drafting of broad rather than specific criminal statutes; and the removal of "intentionality" and "knowledge" as elements from many offenses.

This bill may very well be an improvement over its predecessor S. 1, however, this is not sufficient reason to pass this legislation at this time.

Mr. KENNEDY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

"(B) subsection (a)(5);

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, all this amendment does is to correct an error that was made in a Javits amendment that the Senate has adopted. It is purely a technical amendment.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1161

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment and ask unanimous consent that it be in order to consider it at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will state the amendment.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Alabama (Mr. ALLEN) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1161: Amend amendment No. 1624. On page 333 between lines 11 and 12 add the following new section:

"SEC.—REENACTMENT OF LOGAN ACT—

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

Amend Amendment No. 1624. On page 333 between lines 11 and 12 add the following new section:

"SEC.—REENACTMENT OF LOGAN ACT—

Any citizen of the United States, wherever he may be, who, without authority of the United States, directly or indirectly commences or carries on any correspondence or intercourse with any foreign government or any officer or agent thereof with intent to influence the measures or conduct of any foreign government or of any officer or agent thereof, in relation to any disputes or controversies with the United States, or to defeat the measures of the United States, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than three years, or both.

"This section shall not abridge the right of a citizen to apply, himself or his agent, to any foreign government or the agents thereof for redress of any injury which he may have sustained from such government or any of its agents or subjects."

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, this amendment would reenact the Logan Act, which prevents a private citizen from carrying on or seeking to carry on relations with foreign governments having to do with the foreign relations policy of the U.S. Government. Without this amendment reinstating the Logan Act, which was dropped by the bill, as I pointed out, every man in the country or every woman in the country would be a secretary of state. They would not be precluded from personally seeking to carry on negotiations with foreign governments. With this provision, which, it has been pointed out, has not had any prosecutions under it, I would feel that the existence of the act is a deterrent to individuals, whether they be in an official capacity, outside of the State Department or the President, from seeking to carry on foreign negotiations.

We have seen some Senators going abroad and, apparently, seeking to advocate policies contrary to the policy of the U.S. Government. This would be some sort of deterrent to that type of activity.

I am hopeful that the distinguished manager of the bill will reconsider his previously stated opposition to the amendment and will see the wisdom of accepting the amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am reminded that the Senate has to do business and that there is a busy schedule. I move that we accept the amendment and I hope that my good friend from Alabama is going to be in the conference to fight for it fiercely so it will not get lost on the way over to wherever that conference is.

Mr. ALLEN. I am afraid if it is left up to the Senator from Massachusetts, it will get lost. We do seek to keep it in.

I appreciate the graciousness and courtesy of the distinguished manager of the bill. Also, I commend the distinguished majority leader for pushing this bill along. It has taken only some 8 days to finish and the distinguished manager of the bill had allocated 3 weeks to it. I feel that the Senate has acted expeditiously, but I do believe that carrying the matter over for as long as we have has allowed constructive amendments to come in. I am hopeful that the bill is a much improved one from the bill that came out of the committee. It has not been improved to the point where the Senator from Alabama can vote for it, but I do believe that it is a much better bill.

I appreciate the cooperation that the distinguished manager of the bill has given me in my efforts to make some small changes in the bill.

Mr. KENNEDY. I thank the Senator from Alabama. There have been some valuable contributions made to this legislation. I thank the Senator from Alabama for his involvement in its development here, on the floor, and in the committee.

Mr. President, I send to the desk technical amendments——

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I do not believe we have had a unanimous vote on my amendment yet.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the remainder of the committee amendments may be considered en bloc.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, reserving the right to object.

Several days ago, I offered an amendment that would restore the death penalty in a number of instances. It is my understanding that the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts opposed this. It was not adopted, even though he indicated at the time that he would make every effort to see that the bill was reported out of the committee, but he would vote against the amendment.

There is a large amendment here—it is amendment No. 1624—by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts. It would take a long time to read this; it is 333 pages long. I believe it takes unanimous consent to waive the reading of an amendment. It would take a long time to vote on it if we had a division of the amendment. I understand that, somewhere within these 333 pages, there is a provision that does away with the crime of murder, except for skyjacking, where someone is killed when an airplane is taken over in an unlawful manner.

If that is true, that would mean that the bill, as proposed by former Senator McClellan and 19 cosponsors, would not be properly drawn. This is something that concerns me. I should not want to ask that this entire amendment be read. I would not want to take the time of the Senate by asking that the amendment be divided so that we would have a separate vote on each portion of this 333-page amendment. Yet, I think that, in fairness, the portion of this amendment that would require that the McClellan death penalty bill be rewritten should be eliminated in the event that it is in this amendment, as I understand it to be.

I wonder if the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts will address himself to this.

Mr. KENNEDY. I am not sure what the particular question is that the Senator from Virginia asks.

Mr. SCOTT. I have just gone over it. Perhaps the Senator had some other business that he was transacting at the time.

The distinguished Senator will remember that a few days ago, I did offer an amendment that would reestablish the death penalty for murder in those instances where murder is made a Federal crime under present law, provided that certain procedures were followed as set forth in a rather extensive bill that had been offered by the late Senator McClellan. The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts saw fit to oppose the amendment, but he said at the time that, even though he would vote against the amendment, he would work to see that the death penalty bill was reported out of the Committee on the Judiciary. Yet I am told that, in this comprehensive amendment 1624, there is a provision that eliminates the crime of murder as a Federal crime, except for hijacking, when murder is committed when an airplane is hijacked.

Am I wrong in my assumption that that is in this amendment?

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator is correct that the provisions of the death penalty that have been included in this bill are limited to the skyjacking provisions because that is the only death penalty bill that has been passed subsequent to the Supreme Court decision on the death penalty. With regard to the pending Senate death penalty bill, I am certain it will be recodified into this law at the appropriate time.

We will be passing additional laws, obviously, concerning different crimes and they will be codified into this law.

The Senator is correct in stating that the only provisions on the death penalty in S. 1437 are the provisions that have been passed subsequent to Supreme Court decision.

Mr. SCOTT. The death penalty is still in the code as presently enacted.

Mr. President, I must apologize for my voice. I have had a cold over the weekend and I am taking medication that makes my throat dry.

Mr. President, it is my understanding that within the Federal code as it presently exists, the crime of murder where the death penalty is provided is set forth in a number of instances, that the proposed amendment by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, this lengthy amendment which I have not read, but contains 333 pages, has a provision in it that would strike out the death penalty except where death is during the skyjacking situation.

I would ask that that portion be deleted so that we would still have the crime of murder in the instances where it is presently in the code, even though it may be that the death penalty would be contrary to some recent decisions of the Supreme Court, because these violations of the Constitution would be cured by the McClellan bill. There is no use to offer a bill to make lawful a matter that is in the code now, but is being stricken by this amendment that is proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts. I am sure that the staff member of the committee knows where this provision is, he showed it to me a few days ago, and I would ask that that provision be stricken before we act on this amendment No. 1624.

Mr. KENNEDY. Do I understand the Senator correctly that he wants to strike the aircraft piracy provision?

Mr. SCOTT. No. I want to retain the various crimes of murder as capital offenses as are presently in the code as written before the consideration of this bill.

Mr. KENNEDY. The way that S. 1437 was drafted was to carry forward the existing law on the death penalty. This particular provision was drafted by Senator McClellan; he, in addition, offered a separate bill on the death penalty because he wanted it more comprehensive. We recodified in terms of what the existing law was at the time.

As I stated earlier, because of the Supreme Court decision no expansion of the death penalty takes place in S.1437, the Senate will have an opportunity to speak on that issue. A separate bill will be incorporated.

We dealt with this issue the other evening through your amendment which was intended to draft a death penalty along the lines of Senator McClellan's separate bill. That was rejected.

Now, I gather from what the Senator says that he wants to restore by some means in this recodification the other various words that exist in the current law which have been declared unconstitutional.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, we do not seem to have a meeting of the minds.

I object to the unanimous-consent request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The objection is heard.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, would the Senator object to a unanimous consent that all amendments with the exception of this one he is talking about be adopted en bloc?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I object to the adoption en bloc of the various amendments.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The Senator would not object to the adoption en bloc of amendments that are not related to this issue?

Mr. SCOTT. My thought is this, it is about 20 minutes after 7 and I would like to have an opportunity to study the matter that I am referring to because I have not studied it in detail. It will take sufficient time to read these various amendments to give me that opportunity, if the Senator from Massachusetts does not see fit to understand what I am talking about.

I object, Mr. President.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, could the Senator identify the particular amendment he has in mind?

Mr. SCOTT. The staff man knows what it is.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1162

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, this amendment would correct clerical errors and eliminate technical drafting oversights and make other minor changes needed which were discovered during the staff work. They have been gone over en bloc as a single amendment.

I ask unanimous consent that in such instance they be considered out of order, and I move adoption of this amendment en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BUMPERS). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment will be stated.

(2) Rule 4 is amended by deleting "If it appears" in the first sentence of subdivision (a) and inserting in lieu thereof "Except as provided in 18 U.S.C. 1813(c), if it appears".

(b) Rule 5 is amended:

(1) by deleting "authorized by 18 U.S.C. 3041" in the first sentence of subdivision (a);

(2) by deleting "3401" in subdivision (b) and inserting in lieu thereof "3302"; and

(3) by adding at the end of subdivision (c) the following new sentence: "If a defendant is entitled to a preliminary examination and is not accorded a preliminary examination within the time limits specified in this subdivision or within any authorized extension of such time limits, he shall be discharged from custody, or from the requirement of bail or any other condition of release, without prejudice to the institution of further criminal proceedings against him upon the charge for which he was arrested.".

(c) Rule 6(g) is amended by adding after the words "18 months" in the first sentence the words "unless the court extends the service of the grand jury for a period of six months or less upon a finding that such extention is in the public interest.".

(d) A new Rule 6.1 is added after Rule 6 to read as follows:

"Rule 6.1.—The Special Grand Jury

"(a) SUMMONING SPECIAL GRAND JURIES.—The court is a district:

"(1) in which there are located more than four million inhabitants; or

"(2) concerning which the Attorney General, the Deputy Attorney General, or any designated Assistant Attorney General, certifies in writing to the chief judge that in his judgment a special grand jury is necessary because of criminal activity in the district; shall order a special grand jury to be summoned at least once every eighteen months unless another special grand jury is then serving. If the court at any time determines that the volume of business of the special grand jury exceeds its capacity to discharge its obligations, the court may order an additional special grand jury to be impaneled in that district.

"(b) TERM.—A special grand jury shall serve for a term of eighteen months unless, after a determination of the special grand jury by majority vote that its business has been completed, an order for its discharge is entered earlier by the court. If, at the end of the term or any extension of the term, the court determines that the business of the special grand jury has not been completed, the court may enter an order extending the term for an additional period of six months. If a court fails to extend the term of a special grand jury or enters an order for its discharge before the special grand jury determines that it has completed its business, the special grand jury, upon the affirmative vote of a majority of its members, may apply to the chief judge of the judicial circuit within which the court is located for an order continuing the term. Upon the making of such an application, the term shall continue until the entry of an appropriate order by the chief judge of the circuit. No term of a special grand jury, however extended, shall exceed a total of thirty-six months, except as provided in subdivision (f)(1).

"(c) INVESTIGATION.—A special grand jury shall inquire into offenses alleged to have been committed within the district. Such alleged offense may be brought to the attention of the special grand jury by the court or by an attorney for the government. An attorney for the government, upon receipt of information concerning an alleged offense from a person requesting that the information be transmitted to the special grand jury, shall inform the grand jury of the alleged offense and of the identity of such person, and shall make a recommendation on the matter to the special grand jury.

"(d) SUBMISSION OF REPORT.—A special grand jury, with the concurrence of a majority of its members, may, upon completion of its term or any extension of its term, submit to the court a report:

"(1) concerning noncriminal misconduct, malfeasance, or misfeasance in office by a federal, state, or local public servant, and recommending removal of, or disciplinary action against, such public servant;

"(2) stating that after investigation of a federal, state, or local public servant it find no misconduct, malfeasance, or misfeasance in office by him, and that such public servant has requested the submission of the report;

"(3) concerning organized crime conditions in the judicial district; or

"(4) proposing, upon the basis of stated findings, recommendations for legislative, executive, or administrative action in the public interest.

"(e) ACCEPTANCE OF REPORT.—Upon receipt of a report submitted under subdivision (d), the court shall examine the report and the minutes of the special grand jury and, except as otherwise provided in subdivisions (f) and (g), shall make an order accepting and filing the report as a public record if it is satisfied that:

"(1) the report complies with the provisions of subdivision (d);

"(2) the report is based upon facts revealed in the course of an investigation authorized by subdivision (c) and is supported by a preponderance of the evidence;

"(3) to the extent that the report is submitted under subdivision (d)(1), each person named in the report, and a reasonable number of witnesses in his behalf who were designated by him to the foreman of the special grand jury, were afforded an opportunity to testify prior to the filing of the report; and

"(4) to the extent that the report is submitted under subdivision (d)(3) or (d)(4), the report is not critical of an identified person.

"(f) PROCEDURES FOR REPORT CRITICAL OF A PUBLIC SERVANT.—

"(1) RETURN OF REPORT TO SPECIAL GRAND JURY.—If a court to which a report is submitted under subdivision (d)(1) is not satisfied that the report complies with the provisions of subdivision (e), the court may return the report to the special grand jury and direct that additional testimony be taken. The term of a special grand jury may be extended by the court beyond thirty-six months in order that such additional testimony may be taken and the provisions of subdivision (e) met. Upon the taking of additional testimony, the special grand jury may resubmit the report, or a modified version of the report, to the court.

"(2) TEMPORARY SEALING OF ACCEPTED REPORT.—A report submitted under subdivision (d)(1), and the order accepting the report, shall be sealed by the court and shall not be filed as a public record, produced under subpoena, or otherwise made public:

"(A) until at least thirty-one days after a copy of the order and report are served upon each public servant named in the report, and until an answer has been filed or the time for filing an answer has expired; or

"(B) if an appeal is taken, until all rights of review of the public servant named in the report have expired or terminated in an order accepting the report.

No order accepting a report submitted under subdivision (d)(1) shall be entered until thirty days after the delivery of the report to the public servant or government agency under paragraph (4). The court may issue such orders as it deems appropriate to prevent unauthorized publication of the report.

"(3) ANSWER TO REPORT BY PUBLIC SERVANT.—A public servant named in a report may file with the clerk of the court a verified answer to the report not later than twenty days after service of the order and report upon him. Upon a showing of good cause, the court may grant such public servant an extension of time within which to file a verified answer and may authorize such limited publication of the report as may be necessary for him to prepare an answer. The answer shall plainly and concisely state the facts and law constituting the public servant's defense to the charges in the report. Except for those parts that the court determines to have been inserted scandalously, prejudiciously, or unnecessarily, the answer shall become an appendix to the report.

"(4) DELIVERY OF REPORT TO PUBLIC SERVANT'S SUPERIORS.—Upon the expiration of the times set forth in paragraphs (2)(A) and (2)(B), the attorney for the government shall deliver a copy of the report, and the appendix, if any, to the public servant or government agency having jurisdiction, responsibility, or authority over each public servant named in the report.

"(g) SEALING OF REPORT PENDING CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS.—If the court finds that the filing as a public record of a report submitted under subdivision (d) may prejudice fair consideration of a pending criminal matter, the report shall be sealed by the court and shall not be filed as a public record, produced under subpoena, or otherwise made public during the pendency of such criminal matter, except upon order of the court.

"(h) APPLICABILITY OF OTHER RULES.—The provision of these rules applicable to regular grand juries also apply to special grand juries to the extent that they are not inconsistent with this rule.".

(e) Rule 7(c) is amended:

(1) by deleting the period at the end of paragraph (1) and inserting in lieu thereof the following: ", the grade of the offense, and, if Federal jurisdiction over the offense exists only under specified circumstances, the citation of the jurisdictional provisions alleged to be applicable. The indictment or information need not allege the nonexistence of a defense.";

"(3) PROOF OF AFFIRMATIVE DEFENSES.—If a defendant raises an affirmative defense at trial, the defendant has the burden of proving the defense by a preponderance of the evidence.

"(4) PROOF OF GRADING.—The lowest grade of an offense shall be applicable unless the Government proves the elements of a higher grade beyond a reasonable doubt.

"(5) PRESUMPTIONS.—If a statute provides that a given fact gives rise to a presumption, the statute has the following consequences:

"(A) TRIAL BY JURY.—In a case tried before a jury:

"(i) if there is sufficient evidence of the fact that gives rise to the presumption to support a reasonable belief as to the fact's existence beyond a reasonable doubt, the court shall submit the issue to the jury unless the evidence as a whole clearly precludes a reasonable juror from finding the presumed fact beyond a reasonable doubt; and

"(ii) in submitting to the jury the issue of the existence of the presumed fact, the court shall, upon request of the Government, charge that, although the evidence as a whole must establish the presumed fact beyond a reasonable doubt, the jury may arrive at the judgment on the basis of the presumption alone, since the law regards the fact giving rise to the presumption as strong evidence of the fact presumed.

"(B) TRIAL BY COURT.—In a case tried before the court sitting without a jury, although the evidence as a whole must establish the presumed fact beyond a reasonable doubt, the court may arrive at that judgment on the basis of the presumption alone.

"(6) PRIMA FACIE EVIDENCE.—If a statute provides that a given fact constitutes prima facie evidence, the statute has the following consequences:

"(A) TRIAL BY JURY.—In a case before a jury:

"(i) if there is sufficient evidence of the fact that constitutes prima facie evidence to support a reasonable belief as to fact's existence beyond a reasonable doubt, the court shall submit the issue to the jury unless the evidence as a whole clearly precludes a reasonable juror from finding the inferred fact beyond a reasonable doubt; and

"(ii) in submitting to the jury the issue of the inferred fact concerning which the given fact is prima facie evidence, the court, upon the request of the Government or the defendant, shall charge that, although the evidence as a whole must establish the inferred fact beyond a reasonable doubt, the jury may consider that the given fact is ordinarily a circumstance from which the existence of the inferred fact may be drawn.

"(B) TRIAL BY COURT.—In a case before the court sitting without a jury, although the evidence as a whole must establish the inferred fact beyond a reasonable doubt, the court may consider that the given fact is ordinarily a circumstance from which the existence of the inferred fact may be drawn.

"(b) Proof of Jurisdiction.

"(1) PROOF.—The Government has the burden of proving the existence of Federal jurisdiction over the offense, as set forth in 18 U.S.C. 201, beyond a reasonable doubt.

"(2) PRESENTATION TO COURT DURING TRIAL.—The existence of Federal jurisdiction over the offense is an issue to be decided by the court. The evidence relating to jurisdiction may be presented by the Government in open court in the course of its presentation of the evidence relating to guilt. Any evidence relating to jurisdiction that is not so presented in open court may be presented to the court, out of the presence of the jury, during the course of the presentation of the Government's evidence relating to guilt or after the close thereof. At the close of the presentation of the Government's evidence relating to guilt and of any subsequent presentation of evidence relating to jurisdiction, the issue shall be determined by the court.

"(3) PRESENTATION TO COURT BEFORE TRIAL.—Upon a timely pretrial motion by the attorney for the Government, the issue of the existence of Federal jurisdiction shall be heard by the court before trial and, notwithstanding the provisions of Rule 12(e), shall be determined before trial and may not be deferred for determination at a later time.".

"(b) PRODUCTION OF ENTIRE STATEMENT.—If the entire contents of the statement relate to the subject matter concerning which the witness has testified, the court shall order that the statement be delivered directly to the defendant.

"(c) PRODUCTION OF EXCISED STATEMENT.—If the attorney for the government claims that the statement contains matter that does not relate to the subject matter of the testimony concerning which the witness has testified, the court shall order that it be delivered to the court in camera. Upon inspection, the court shall excise the portions of the statement that do not relate to the subject matter concerning which the witness has testified, and shall order that the statement, with such material excised, be delivered to the defendant. Any portion of the statement that is withheld from the defendant over his objection shall be preserved by the attorney for the government, and, in the event of a conviction and an appeal by the defendant, shall be made available to the appellate court for the purpose of determining the correctness of the decision to excise the portion of the statement.

"(d) RECESS FOR EXAMINATION OF STATEMENT.—Upon delivery of the statement to the defendant, the court, upon application of the defendant, may recess proceedings in the trial for such time as is reasonably required for the examination of the statement by the defendant and for his preparation for its use in the trial.

"(e) SANCTION FOR FAILURE TO PRODUCE STATEMENT.—If the attorney for the government elects not to comply with an order to deliver a statement to the defendant, the court shall order that the testimony of the witness be stricken from the record and that the trial proceed, or shall declare a mistrial if required by the interest of justice.

"(f) DEFINITION.—As used in this rule, a 'statement' of a government witness means:

"(1) a written statement made by the witness that is signed or otherwise adopted or approved by him;

"(b) The Director may contract with the proper authorities of a State, territory, or locality for the official detention, including safekeeping, care, subsistence, correctional programs, and employment, in a Federal penal or correctional facility, of a person convicted of an offense in a court of such State or territory, if the Director finds that proper and adequate treatment facilities and personnel are available. Each such contract may provide for reimbursement to the United States for any service rendered or incurred. Funds received under such contracts shall be deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the appropriation available for providing such services. Each such contract which does not provide for the cash reimbursement for a service rendered on a cost incurred shall include a provision for the exchange of services of offenders on a man-day basis. Such facility may be used for the official detention of persons held under the authority of title 18 or of any other Act of Congress and of any other person who, in the opinion of the Director, is a proper subject for official detention in such facility.

If such monetary limitation is insufficient to secure a proper site or to construct the necessary facilities, the Director may authorize the expenditure of a sum not to exceed $10,000 in each instance to secure options and to make preliminary surveys or plans for such facilities. Upon selection of an appropriate site, the Director shall submit to the Congress an estimate of the cost of purchasing such site and of remodeling, constructing, and equipping the necessary buildings for such facilities. A sum authorized under this subsection shall be payable from any unexpended balance of the appropriation 'Support of United States prisoners.'

"(A) assure the meeting of the purposes of sentencing as set forth in section 101(b) of title 18, United States Code;

"(C) reflect, to the extent practicable, advancement in knowledge of human behavior as it relates to the criminal justice process; and

"(2) develop means of measuring the degree to which the sentencing, penal, and correctional practices are effective in meeting the purposes of sentencing as set forth in section 101(b) of title 18, United States Code.

The Chairman shall:

"(a) call and preside at meetings of the Commission; and

"(1) guidelines, as described in subsection (b) through (d) and (f) through (m), for use of a sentencing court in determining the sentence to be imposed in a criminal case, including:

"(A) a determination whether to impose a sentence to probation, a fine, or a term of imprisonment;

"(B) a determination as to the appropriate amount of a fine or the appropriate length of a term of probation or a term of imprisonment; and

"(C) a determination whether a portion of a term of imprisonment should be designated as subject to a defendant's early release, and, if so, the length of such portion of the term; and

"(2) general policy statements regarding application of the guidelines or any other aspect of sentencing that in the view of the Commission would further the purposes set forth in section 101(b) of title 18, United States Code.

"(b) The Commission, in the guidelines promulgated pursuant to subsection (a)(1), shall, for each category of offense involving each category of defendant, establish a sentencing range that is consistent with all pertinent provisions of title 18, United States Code. If a sentence specified by the guidelines includes a term of imprisonment:

"(1) the maximum of the range established for such a term shall not exceed the minimum of that range by more than 25 percent; and

"(2) the guidelines shall specify that the term of imprisonment is not to be subject to a defendant's early release, other than in an exceptional situation in which a term subject to the defendant's early release is necessary to satisfy the purposes to be served by the sentence and is consistent with the court's specific findings made pursuant to subsection (j).

"(c) The Commission, in establishing categories of offenses for use in the guidelines governing imposition of sentences of probation, a fine, or imprisonment, and governing imposition of other authorized sanctions, shall consider, but shall not limit its consideration to the relevancy of:

"(1) the grade of the offense;

"(2) the circumstances under which the offense was committed which mitigate or aggravate the seriousness of the offense;

"(3) the nature and degree of the harm caused by the offense, including whether it involved property, irreplaceable property, a person, a number of persons, or a breach of public trust;

"(4) the community view of the gravity of the offense;

"(5) the public concern generated by the offense;

"(6) the deterrent effect a particular sentence may have on the commission of the offense by others; and

"(7) the current incidence of the offense in the community and in the nation as a whole.

"(d) The Commission in establishing categories of defendants for use in the guidelines governing imposition of sentences of probation, a fine, or imprisonment, and governing imposition of other authorized sanctions, shall consider, but shall not limit its consideration to, the relevancy of a defendant's:

"(1) age;
"(2) education;
"(3) vocational skills;
"(4) mental and emotional conditions to the extent that such condition mitigates the defendant's culpability or to the extent that such condition is otherwise plainly relevant;
"(5) physical condition, including drug dependence;
"(6) previous employment record;
"(7) family ties and responsibilities;
"(8) community ties;
"(9) role in the offense;
"(10) criminal history; and
"(11) degree of dependence upon criminal activity for a livelihood.

"(e) The Commission, by affirmative vote of at least four members of the Commission, and pursuant to its rules and regulations and consistent with all pertinent provisions of this title and title 18, United States Code, shall promulgate and distribute to the United States Parole Commission:

"(1) guidelines consistent with those promulgated pursuant to subsection (a)(1) of this section for use of the United States Parole Commission in making decisions within its jurisdiction, including whether to grant early release to a prisoner who is eligible for such release and the length of the term and conditions of parole for all prisoners released; and

"(2) general policy statements regarding application of the guidelines or any other aspect of early release or parole that in the view of the Commission would further the purposes set forth in section 101(b) of title 18, United States Code.

"(f) The Commission, in promulgating guidelines pursuant to subsection (a)(1), shall promote the purposes set forth in section 991(b)(1), with particular attention to the requirements of subsection 991(b)(1)(B) for providing certainty and fairness in sentencing and reducing unwarranted sentence disparities.

"(g) The Commission, in promulgating guidelines pursuant to subsection (a)(1), shall seek to satisfy the purposes of sentencing as set out in section 101(b) of title 18, United States Code, taking into account the nature and capacity of the penal, correctional, and other facilities and services available in order not only to assure that the most appropriate facilities and services are utilized to fulfill the applicable purposes but also to assure that the available capacities of such facilities and services will not be exceeded.

"(h) The Commission shall assure that the guidelines will specify a sentence to a substantial term of imprisonment in a case in which the defendant:

"(1) has a history of prior federal, state, or local felony convictions for offenses committed on different occasions;

"(2) committed the offense as part of a pattern of criminal conduct from which he derived a substantial portion of his income; or

"(3) committed the offense in furtherance of a conspiracy with three or more persons engaging in a pattern of racketeering activity in which the defendant participated in a managerial or supervisory capacity.

"(i) The Commission shall insure that the guidelines reflect the appropriateness of imposing a sentence other than imprisonment in cases in which the defendant is a first offender under twenty-six years of age who has not been convicted of a crime of violence or an otherwise serious offense.

"(j) The Commission shall insure that the guidelines reflect the inappropriateness of imposing a sentence to a term of imprisonment for the purpose of providing the defendant with needed educational or vocational training, medical care, or other correctional treatment, other than in an exceptional case in which imprisonment appears to be the sole means of achieving such purpose and in which the court makes specific findings as to that fact.

"(k) The Commission shall insure that the guidelines reflect the appropriateness of imposing an incremental penalty for each offense in a case in which a defendant is convicted of multiple offenses committed at different times.

"(l) The Commission, in initially promulgating guidelines for particular categories of cases, shall take into consideration the average sentences imposed in such categories of cases prior to the creation of the Commission, and in cases involving sentences to terms of imprisonment, the length of such terms actually served.

"(m) The Commission periodically shall review and revise, in consideration of comments and data coming to its attention, the guidelines promulgated pursuant to the provisions of this section. In fulfilling its duties and in exercising its powers, the Commission shall consult with authorities on, and individual and institutional representatives of, various aspects of the federal criminal justice system. The United States Probation System, the United States Parole Commission, the Bureau of Prisons, the Judicial Conference of the United States, the Criminal Division of the United States Department of Justice, and a representative of the Federal Pubic Defenders shall submit to the Commission any observations, comments, or questions pertinent to the work of the Commission whenever it believes such communication would be useful, and shall, at least annually, submit to the Commission a written report commenting on the operation of the Commission's guidelines, suggesting changes in the guidelines that appear to be warranted, and otherwise assessing the Commission's work.

"(n) The Commission, at or after the beginning of a regular session of Congress but not later than the first day of May, shall report to the Congress the guidelines promulgated pursuant to subsection (a)(1) or (f)(1), and the guidelines shall take effect one hundred and eighty days after the Commission reports them.

"(o) The Commission shall ensure that the general policy statements promulgated pursuant to subsection (a)(2) include a policy limiting consecutive terms of imprisonment for an offense involving a violation of a general prohibition and for an offense involving a violation of a specific prohibition encompassed within the general prohibition.

"(p) The Commission shall require that the appropriate judge or officer submit to the Commission in connection with each sentence imposed a written report of the sentence, the offense for which it is imposed, the age, race, and sex of the offender, information regarding factors made relevant by the guidelines, and such other information as the Commission finds appropriate. The Commission shall submit to Congress at least annually an analysis of these reports and any recommendation for legislation that the Commission concludes is warranted by that analysis.

"(q) The provisions of 5 U.S.C. 553 shall apply to the promulgation of guidelines pursuant to subsections (a) through (m).

"§ 995. Powers of Commission

So amendment numbered 1624, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. BAYH. Mr. President, I am pleased that the Senate has adopted S. 1437—the criminal code bill. It is indeed an historic occasion since this is the first time this body has enacted such an extensive code since the founding of the Republic.

This task has not been an easy one, or one hastily completed. In 1966 the Congress recognized the need for reform and established the National Commission on Reform of Federal Criminal Laws—known as the Brown Commission. Its work was indeed monumental and several legislative versions of its recommendations have been introduced over the last three Congresses. The predecessor to the bill we are adopting today, S. 1, was perhaps the best known, most controversial and least desirable of the lot. It also bore little resemblance to the Brown Commission's recommendations.

Mr. President, this legislation is, I believe, a tremendous step forward for the fair, just, and efficient administration of criminal laws in the United States. The Criminal Code Act repeals outmoded offenses and consolidates numerous similar criminal statutes that are currently scattered throughout hundreds of criminal laws. For example, there exists today literally dozens of theft offenses each describing the crime of theft in different terms and prescribing widely different penalties for the same crime. Not only does this situation create inefficiencies, confusion, and backlogs in our court system but it also constitutes a constant danger of abuse in terms of treatment for a particular defendant. When the same criminal act can be treated either too lightly or too harshly depending on the particular theft statute a prosecutor happens to pick, our criminal justice system is in danger of becoming a process based more on arbitrary luck than firm, fair, and consistent enforcement of our laws.

In addition to different definitions for the same offense, current Federal law also uses a broad range of terms to describe the state of mind a defendant must have to commit a particular crime. In its study of the code the committee discovered some 79 different terms such as "maliciously," "improperly," and "feloniously." Obviously, this situation is likely to cause more confusion than clarity and can only result in a loss of both effectiveness and fairness—a loss which can no longer be tolerated in our criminal justice system.

I am pleased therefore that this legislation will remedy many of these inequities found in our present set of criminal laws.

Of course, Mr. President, any attempt to codify so many statutes must lead to some disagreements. As it was originally introduced there were still areas of this bill which caused me some concern. At the Judiciary Committee consideration of S. 1437, therefore, I introduced a series of amendments mostly aimed at improving the civil liberties and freedom of press aspects of the bill. I was pleased that most of these were adopted by the committee, and I believe they represent not only a strengthening of certain fundamental constitutional rights but also an improvement in the effective allocation of Federal Government resources in the fight against crime. They are:

First. Sections 1331 and 1335 criminal contempt and disobeying a judicial order: My amendment provides that a defendant to a charge of violating a court order may raise the defense that the order was invalid if it constituted a prior restraint on the collection or dissemination of news. Under the bill as originally drafted and under current law a reporter who violates a court order can be jailed even if the order is subsequently found to be invalid.

Second. Section 1813 possessing drugs: This amendment eliminates arrest and imprisonment penalties for simple possession of small amounts of marijuana. It also provides for a summons rather than an arrest procedure, imposition of a fine rather than imprisonment, and the expungement of arrest and correction records.

Third. Section 1641 rape: As drafted the code would have prevented any rape charge between spouses regardless of the severity of the assaults or threats used in the commission of the crime. My amendment eliminated this immunity thus allowing a rape conviction of a spouse if in fact sufficient abusive force or threats of serious bodily harm was employed.

Fourth. Sections 1332 and 1333 contempt penalties: As drafted the code would have set penalties for contempt at 3 years. The amendment would set the penalty at 1 year for Congress while retaining the 3-year punishment for contempt of administrative agencies.

Fifth. Section 1343 making a false statement: As drafted the code would have provided criminal penalties for making a false statement to a law enforcement officer. The amendment requires that before oral statements can be subject to this provision the officer must give warnings to the citizen that his or her response may be subject to criminal penalties.

Sixth. Section 1861 failure to obey a public safety officer: As originally drafted the code would have allowed any Federal employee (including Federal jurors) to issue orders at a fire, flood, or emergency. Failure to obey these orders would be a criminal offense. The amendment limited the power to issue such orders to law enforcement and public safety officers such as fire or forest service personnel.

Seventh. Section 3613 discharge procedures for persons confined for mental illness: This amendment provides additional protections for persons involuntarily confined for treatment following a finding of not guilty by reason of insanity. It allows for a patient's guardian or lawyer to make a request of the judge for a hearing on the issue of a timely release.

Eighth. Title III, section 994: Amendment to duties of sentencing commission encouraging alternatives to incarceration for young first offenders convicted of a nonviolent offense.

Ninth. Section 1112 impairing military effectiveness: As originally drafted this section of the code would have punished reckless conduct which could impair, interfere with or distract the ability of the United States to prepare for its defense. My amendment narrowed this overly-broad applicability of the offense to times of war or the actual damage inflicted on a major weapon system.

Mr. President, I am particularly pleased that an amendment offered on the floor by Senator CHURCH and myself has been incorporated in the Criminal Code bill. This amendment would make it a Federal offense to rob in excess of $500 worth of narcotics, amphetamines, or barbiturates from a pharmacy. Such robberies would be punishable by a fine of no more than $100,000 and imprisonment of up to 12 years.

The purpose of this amendment is to prevent the diversion of dangerous drugs into our communities. It is a result of several studies and investigations which I was privileged to undertake in my former role as chairman of the Juvenile Delinquency Subcommittee. In 1974 I held hearings before the subcommittee entitled "Drug Abuse—the Pharmacist" which studied the background and feasibility of this amendment. The hearings were part of the subcommittee's ongoing investigation of drug traffic and its assessment of the effectiveness of the 1970 Controlled Substances Act which the subcommitee had written to halt the widespread diversion and theft of legal drugs as well as the illicit traffic in dangerous drugs. As a consequence of this legislation, there was a drastic reduction of the illicit traffic and the clandestine manufacture of barbiturates and amphetamines. Thus, pushers and abusers alike began concentrating their attention on the legitimate sources of these drugs, particularly pharmacies.

Today, nearly 80 percent of all thefts of controlled drugs from registrants are from pharmacies and 89 percent of all drugs stolen from registrants are taken from pharmacies. Almost half of the total volume of drugs stolen are amphetamines and barbiturates. During fiscal year 1975, the latest year for which we have figures, 7,565 such thefts were reported from pharmacies as contrasted with 4,333 for fiscal year 1973.

I am pleased therefore, that the Senate has adopted this amendment thus allowing the Federal Government to assist State and local officials in halting this dangerous flow of illicit drugs into our neighborhoods.

Mr. President, in closing I want to congratulate Senators KENNEDY and THURMOND for the work they have done not only as floor managers of this bill, but also for their labors in the committee. As one who has been interested and involved in this legislation throughout this process I am aware of the tremendous time and effort they have invested in the Criminal Code.

We should also bear in mind the efforts by our former colleague Senator Hruska and by two Members of this body who have passed away—Senators McClellan and Hart. Without the combbined efforts and dedication of all these individuals the legislation we are passing today would not be possible.

Mr. President, I am proud to have been a part of this historic process.

While there are parts of this legislation with which I am not in total agreement I believe the compromises we reached are reasonable ones and have contributed to enacting a realistic Criminal Code that will better serve America, and the cause of Justice, for many years.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, it is most appropriate that S. 1437, the Criminal Code Reform Act of 1977, should be the first bill to be considered by the Senate during this session. I know that my friend, the late Senator McClellan, would have been pleased and gratified by this because the consideration of this bill by the Senate marks an important and significant step toward the goal for which the former Senator from Arkansas, the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY), and many others worked so diligently for more than 10 years. This goal was and is a truly modern Federal Criminal Code.

I am glad to support S. 1437, Mr. President, not merely because of sentimental reasons involving Senator McClellan, but rather because, on the merits, I am convinced that the existing unhappy and unsatisfactory state of Federal criminal laws cries out for prompt corrective action. The need for codification and revision of Federal criminal laws should be uncontroverted. The present statutes have more or less "grown up" in a haphazard and illogical manner during the past 200 years. Many of them have become outdated or contain imprecise, conflicting and inconsistent provisions. Many no longer reflect the values or meet the requirements of our modern society. For many years now our efforts to protect life, property and human rights have been hobbled and impeded by the most fundamental element of a criminal justice system—the law itself.

The legislation we are now considering is a massive effort to codify and update some 3,000 Federal criminal statutes. It is the culmination of a monumental undertaking which started in 1966 when the Congress established the National Commission on Reform of Federal Criminal Laws. It constitutes the most important and far-reaching attempt in history to reorganize and streamline the administration of Federal criminal justice.

Many people, in and out of Congress, contributed significantly to the effort and to its culmination. I have already mentioned the outstanding work of Senator McClellan and Senator KENNEDY. While I make no effort to give an even partially complete list, I do want to pay tribute to the contributions made by the distinguished former Senator from Nebraska, Roman Hruska, the late Philip Hart, an outstanding Senator from Michigan, and to the distinguished former Governor of California, Pat Brown, who chaired the National Commission on Reform of Federal Criminal Laws.

It is impossible, Mr. President, for me to discuss this monumental legislation in any detail. I do, however, want to stress the fact that there is a clear need for prompt reform if we are to preserve the liberties the criminal law is designed to protect. As Senator McClellan said on the floor of the Senate on January 12, 1973:

> If we delay reform too long, we run the real risk that the price of delayed reform may be that the framework of civil liberty and federalism embodied in our Constitution and Bill of Rights will be condemned and abolished by those seeking to achieve only efficiency in the operation of our system of criminal justice. We cannot permit that to happen.

Let me point out, Mr. President, that I had the privilege to serve for several years as a trial judge of a court of unlimited civil and criminal jurisdiction. In that capacity I was called upon to perform the full range of judicial duties. The most important of these was the imposition of sentences upon persons convicted of crimes. I believed then, and believe now, that the sentences imposed must be stringent enough to deter the wrongdoer. Our people are entitled to the full protection of the law to insure their safety and the imposition of proper, positive, and reasonable sentences is a part of this protection.

Therefore, I want to take this opportunity to comment specifically on the provisions of the bill relating to sentencing in Federal courts. One of the objectives of the bill is to lay down a sentencing guideline which will attack to some extent the problem of unwarranted disparity in sentencing by different Federal judges.

This is a welcome step toward eliminating the wide differences in criminal sentencing which now result in some criminals receiving far greater penalties than others convicted of the same crime. I endorse this step and hope it will be followed by others. Logic and history prove that the most effective deterrent to crime is the certainty of swift, sure, and appropriate punishment. There must be a punishment that will carry a real sting to the offender and that "sting" must be sufficient to deter him from coming back for another dose.

Penal rehabilitation is a fine ideal and goal, but I feel that punishment of the offender must be a major factor in the sentence imposed if it is to be a real deterrent to crime. Criminals will be deterred only when the system of criminal justice operates so as to convince them, either from observation or personal experience, that if they are convicted of a criminal offense, punishment fitting the crime will surely and inexorably be visited upon them. Those who commit felonies must be made to know without doubt that, if apprehended and convicted, they will certainly be held to full account for their transgressions against society.

Mr. President, although I support the objectives of this bill I certainly do not suggest that it is written in concrete or that I agree with all of its provisions. Compromises, concessions, and accommodations have already been made to get the bill before the Senate. Additional compromises, concessions, and accommodations may be necessary or desirable. I am certainly more than willing to support any amendment which will make it a better bill. In the end, however, I hope that an understanding of the depth of public concern and a recognition of the long standing need for reform will lead us to pass an acceptable bill and send it to the House of Representatives.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I voted not to report S. 1437 when the bill was considered in the Committee on the Judiciary. The bill has been somewhat improved by action here on the floor, but the bill is still inherently defective and I intend to vote against passage of the bill here in the Senate.

S. 1437 introduces a completely new way of defining Federal criminal offenses. Each crime is defined without reference to the factors which give rise to Federal interest in prohibiting the conduct proscribed. Each crime is defined simply in general terms similar to those used to define criminal conduct at common law or in State statutes. Only in a separate subsection of each crime enumerated is a list given of factors that give the Federal Government jurisdiction over the particular offense. For example, robbery is defined in section 1721 as taking property from the person or presence of another by force or by threat of imminent bodily injury, but a separate subsection entitled "Jurisdiction" lists the basis upon which a Federal prosecution can be brought for robbery and includes simply that the robbery affected interstate commerce as a factor giving the Federal courts jurisdiction over the crime. This is a novel approach.

The significance of this novel approach followed in this proposed criminal code—the significance of this change in drafting style in defining Federal crimes—is that a jurisdictional factor will no longer be considered an element of the offense—and that fact is stated explicitly in section 201(c) of the proposed code. Since jurisdiction will no longer be considered an element of the offense, this in turn means that the determination as to whether the jurisdictional circumstance exists will be a determination of law made by the judge, not by the jury. Apparently, the judge would not apply a reasonable doubt standard, as is presently the case, in making that determination. Whether this procedure is constitutional or not remains to be determined, but in any event it is clear that no mens rea—or culpability of mind—would be required as to the jurisdictional factor. In other words, it would not be necessary to determine that the accused knew that interstate commerce would be affected by his robbery .

Obviously, I believe that robbery should be punished to the fullest extent of the law, but this change is a serious infringement on the right to a jury trial because S. 1437 takes away from the jury the resolution of factors giving rise to Federal jurisdiction. Current Federal statutes include in the definition of the offense all factors giving rise to a Federal interest, and a jury determines if those factors are present. The circumstances of jurisdiction are an element of the offense and must be found to exist by the jury beyond a reasonable doubt.

But, Mr. President, the most dangerous change made by S. 1437 is that it would give—by its broadly drawn jurisdictional provisions—to the Federal Government concurrent jurisdiction with the States over a significant portion of the crimes that have traditionally been exclusive State jurisdiction. For the most part, S. 1437 does not criminalize conduct which is not already made criminal under State law. But it does effect a fundamental redistribution of power between the States and the Federal Government. The bill would go a long way toward turning the Federal Criminal Code into a national Criminal Code. It would go a long way toward turning Federal investigative agencies into national police forces having an enforce-

This proposed increase in Federal jurisdiction over crimes is an unfortunate continuation of an historical process that dates from the beginning of this century. Until that time, Federal criminal statutes were limited in nature and were designed to forbid conduct clearly affecting a Federal interest. Until that time, there had been no significant Federal police force, save for a few Treasury agents and postal inspectors. But with the gradual enactment of criminal statutes based on the interstate commerce clause, the Federal law enforcement forces have grown significantly. I think that trend has been, on the whole. beneficial. But, Mr. President, the time has not come to draw the line. This country is not ready for a national police force, and I do not believe this country is ready to have its basic criminal statutes enforced by the Federal Government to the exclusion of the States nor do I believe this country will ever be ready to adopt a criminal code which will provide a framework for the development of a national police force with plenary law enforcement authority.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, S. 1437, the Criminal Code Reform Act, has been extensively debated by the Senate. Many amendments have been adopted but many meritorious amendments have been defeated. S. 1437 would correct flaws in the Criminal Code, but would create a great many new problems. This legislation is superior to S. 1 in the last Congress, but many improvements need to be made. Therefore, I am voting against S. 1437 in the hope that the Judiciary Committee will continue its work and report out a more acceptable version of the Criminal Code Reform Act.

LAW MUST REFLECT OUR GOALS

Any set of criminal laws has at least two primary purposes. One is the protection of society from those who are not willing to respect the rights of others. The preservation of an orderly society requires that laws exist to deter those tempted to crime and punish those who violate the rules of society.

The other essential purpose of a criminal code is to administer justice on an individual basis. Justice requires both an impartial trier of fact and similar treatment of persons in similar circumstances. S. 1437 should be a step away from disparate treatment of individuals with essentially the same degree of culpability who have committed the same crime.

SOME SUBSTANTIVE CHANGES ARE IMPORTANT

The primary innovation in S. 1437 is in the sentencng area. The entire structure of Federal sentencing will be altered by S. 1437. The new U.S. sentencing Commission is given the responsibility of establishing guidelines for sentencing. The goal is to give to society a guaranty that an appropriate sentence will be imposed and to the offender the knowledge that he will be treated equally with other offenders. If a sentence is imposed outside the guidelines, the party adversely affected, either the convicted or the Government, can appeal the sentence as a matter of right. This attempt at instituting uniformity in sentencing may or may not work. The Sentencing Commission has enormous discretion. The Senator from Kansas believes that the Senate should make instructions to the Commission more explicit. Too often the intent of Congress is subverted because we fail to adequately direct the use of the discretion we give to the bureaucrats.

MOST FAULTS ARE FROM OMISSIONS

Unlike its highly controversial predecessor, S. 1, this legislation has avoided taking a position on many volatile issues. Many of these omissions such as the lack of a comprehensive death penalty section are viewed as defects by the Senator from Kansas. The Judiciary Committee made a conscious and conscientious effort to reduce the controversy to a minimum. The legislation would have been greatly improved with a few important additions. The result of avoiding controversy has been an inadequate bill.

AMENDMENTS HAVE IMPROVED THE BILL

The Senate debate on S. 1437 has been extensive and beneficial. Several areas of weakness in the bill have been corrected. Three amendments I offered to the bill were adopted and have improved the legislation.

REPEATERS FACE STIFF SENTENCES

The first amendment will insure that a person convicted of a crime which was committed while the criminal was on release for another crime, will receive a substantial term of imprisonment. Those hardened criminals who commit crimes of violence while on release pending trial, sentencing, or appeal will be assured of extensive jail terms. Knowledge that they face stiff punishment for violent crimes while out on bail will deter some repeat offenders. Those who do not heed the warning will be dealt with severely.

COMMUNITY GIVEN PROTECTION

The second amendment I offered increases the number of offenses for which pretrial release on bail may be denied by Federal judges if the defendant is shown to be a danger to the community. The new offenses are murder, rape, armed robbery, armed kidnapping, and hostage-taking. Before release could be denied, the Government would have to convince the judge that the accused represents a continuing danger to the community.

Only when this heavy burden of proof is met would the judge be able to deny pretrial release. This section will only operate against the most serious offenders but these are the criminals who pose the greatest threat to the community.

LOCALITY SHOULD DECIDE

The final amendment which I offered was accepted by an extremely close margin. This amendment places the Federal Government in its proper role in the suppression of obscenity. The Government may prosecute obscenity anywhere but my amendment requires that the people of that area be allowed to judge for themselves whether the publication is obscene. The State or local community will be given the right to apply its own standard of obscenity and not some mythical national standard. The Supreme Court has expressly ruled that the standard used in my amendment is constitutional but not constitutionally required. My amendment will insure that the State or local community is given the final voice in obscenity prosecutions.

TWO IMPORTANT SENATORS MISSING

Mr. President, two of the men most responsible for the bill that is now before us are no longer in the Senate. One, Senator Roman Hruska, has gone back to his native Nebraska, the State which he served so well. Before his retirement at the end of the 94th Congress, Senator Hruska left his indelible mark on this Criminal Code reform. As ranking minority member of the Judiciary Committee, Senator Hruska combined the leadership and insight necessary to shape this reform into an acceptable package.

The other former Senator who played such an important role in bringing this bill to the floor is the late Senator John L. McClellan whose sudden death last year saddened every Member of this body. Nevertheless, the spirit of compromise that he showed in reshaping S. 1 of the 94th Congress into S. 1437 now on the floor was instrumental in bringing this legislation before the Senate today.

BILL IS PART OF CONTINUING PROCESS

Mr. President, the legislation now before us is not the last word in Federal criminal law. Title 18 of the United States Code will continue to be changed as our Nation needs change. The Senator from Kansas is disappointed that several important areas are not included in this bill. I am voting against this bill not because I am against every provision in it but rather because of the failure of this legislation to cover very important issues in the Federal criminal law.

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I intend to vote against this bill. Although I am sensitive to the need for a recodification of the federal criminal code, I do not believe that S. 1437 is an acceptable way to meet this need.

In all the debate on this bill and its predecessors, it has been very clear that constitutional rights and civil liberties have been the subject of considerable compromise. In some areas, these compromises have led to advances over current law—the repeal of the Smith Act, more sensitive provisions concerning rape victims, and more effective protections against unlawful discrimination, for example. In other areas, however, our constitutional rights have been compromised away. Rights of free speech and protest against Government activity have been weakened, in one provision after another. S. 1437 strengthens the power of the Federal Government to investigate and prosecute citizens who, for one reason or another, disagree with Government policy.

In revamping the Federal criminal code, the bill does not address the true nature of our mounting crime problem. It does not deal with the vast majority of violent crimes, which are handled by hard-pressed State and local authorities under state law. The Federal Government must expand its partnership with these authorities to help develop effective means of preventing and eliminating murder, rape, muggings, and theft. These deadly serious problems will not be solved by passing a bill whose taproots can still be traced back to the paranoia and repressiveness of the Nixon administration. It is a mistake to pass a law criminalizing legitimate protest when our efforts should be directed to helping the States deal with violent crimes.

For these reasons I must reluctantly oppose this recodification bill.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I rise to announce my intention to oppose S. 1437.

It is poorly drafted. It vastly expands the ambit of criminality. And makes large numbers of policy decisions which have been inadequately presented to this body.

What the late Senator John McClellan worked long and hard to produce is a document which restated current law, resolved contradictions and ambiguities, and brought together disparate criminal proscriptions scattered throughout judicial opinions and civil law.

What S. 1437 has become is a law unto itself—a massive re-creation whose full implications are known only by its prosecutorial draftsmen.

There are probably few in this body who recognize that S. 1437 would make criminal unintentional business peccadillos, bureaucratic lies, and joking threats. In many cases, these acts are already subject to civil remedies and job disciplinary action. There is a question, however, at whether these everyday acts should also become Federal crimes; and there is an even more serious question of whether such law should be silently enacted in the entrails of a monstrous, 324-page bill.

At first, I thought such law expansion simply represented careless draftsmanship. After negotiating with the Justice Department over the questions of whether duck hunters should be subject to a 2-year mandatory minimum sentence, however, I have come to realize that many of the policy decisions were deliberate.

They ask: "Why are you so obsessed with current law?" The answer is that I am not. But, to the extent that current law is to be changed to criminalize vast amounts of near-ordinary conduct, I thing it is the elected Representatives who should make the decision to do so, not some faceless prosecutorial bureaucrat interested only in increasing his own trial leverage.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I will vote against S. 1437, the Criminal Code Reform Act, because the bill will tip the delicate balance of police power in our Nation too much in the direction of the Federal Government and it inhibits whistle blowing on Government wrongdoing.

Americans enjoy unparalleled civil and political freedom partly because our Constitution, in addition to the specific guarantees of the Bill of Rights, does not concentrate police power in any one place. On the contrary, the Constitution deliberately disrupts and makes difficult the consolidation of power. Between the cracks and the gaps, freedom, like an alpine flower flourishes.

The Department of Justice wants the bill passed because existing law is inconsistent, contains omissions and is difficult to enforce from a prosecutor's point of view. When the plastering over of existing cracks and filling the gaps is completed, the Department will have in its grasp a monolithic prosecutorial and investigative jurisdiction capable of reaching virtually every nook and cranny of American life. The only practical limitation on this jurisdiction will be the limits of the ingenuity of the prosecutors and of their resources.

Another consequence of S. 1437 will be the vast grant of new interpretative authority and discretion given to the Department of Justice and courts. S. 1437 will permit the Department and the courts to reinterpret and redefine virtually all Federal statutory criminal law. Congress in the past has enacted recodifications of Federal criminal law. But S. 1437 as all agree is more than merely a reorganized compilation of criminal statutes.

The bill consolidates and collapses numerous specific offenses into new general offenses. In the process the new offense becomes greater than the sum of its parts. The committee recognizes this fact throughout the committee report. I am not satisfied that the work done to date on the bill has adequately assessed the impact of these new offenses on conduct not previously within the effective scope of the present Federal criminal law. This is particularly true with respect to chapter 13 dealing with offenses involving Government process and the inchoate crimes provisions in chapter 10.

The bill also takes vague and unenforceable provisions from existing law and by redefining them in a more limited way—which in one sense is praiseworthy—makes them enforceable as a practical matter. This is a mixed blessing.

For example, in the critical area of disclosing national defense information, difficulties imposed on prosecutors required by due process have had the practical effect of permitting the free flow of information to the public of such defense-related issues as cost-overruns and abuses by the CIA and similar actions of wrongdoing by Government. To the extent that even a simple misdemeanor in this area becomes easily enforceable it automatically will constrict the public's knowledge of what their Government is doing other than that which the Government wants them to know.

Similarly, many provisions of S. 1437 will provide prosecutors with refurbished tools for going after activity which hitherto for practical reasons they could not reach. This may be both good and bad. But what we do not know is what will happen and whether we ought to consider limitations not proposed by the committee or thought of by critics of the bill who may not be familiar with all activities of citizens which could come within the scope of prohibitions of S. 1437.

I have mentioned chapter 13 as a particular instance of a considerable expansion of Federal criminal jurisdiction in ways which can limit citizens' freedoms.

This chapter arms the Government with criminal sanctions to back up the edicts, paperwork requirements, and actions of any army of 100,000 bureaucrats with law enforcement responsibilities in 87 departments and agencies. Under certain circumstances citizens can run afoul of Federal criminal law in confrontations with Federal contractors and consultants who in one way or another may be carrying out functions protected by chapter 13 and S. 1437.

A sampling of the new agencies covered by chapter 13 include OSHA with its powers to enter the some 4 million workplaces in the United States, EPA, ERISA, and CPSC. In addition, to the extent that Congress may create new administrative enforcement agencies to meet the energy crisis and the as yet unforeseen crisis ahead of us, we automatically will be promoting the growth of Federal criminal jurisdiction.

Chapter 13's reach is best summed up by the committee report which says:

> The scope of the subchapter is as broad as the range of governmental functions.

For example, section 1302, "Obstructing a Government Function by Physical Interference," makes some basic changes in law. The report explains:

> These [existing] statutes are deficient in that, while numerous, they nonetheless fail to encompass all of the types of physical obstruction that may occur, they mingle assaultive conduct with other forms of physical obstruction, and they lack overall grading consistency.

The report adds:

> Current law also contains a judicial defense of uncertain scope with respect to the right to resist by force an unlawful government function, such as an unlawful arrest or search.

This common law defense is virtually eliminated by section 1302. In other words, if DEA raids the wrong house in the middle of the night by mistake but has a proper warrant for the right house, the unlucky homeowner who blasted away at the intruders with a shotgun will not have a defense to his actions.

Section 1335, disobeying a judicial order, establishes as a criminal offense conduct previously only punishable as contempt under 18 U.S.C. 401(3).

In the explanation of section 1343, "Making a False Statement," the report language specifically expresses the drafts men's hopes that—

> This more rational grading structure will . . . reduce the incentive for courts to create exceptions to the coverage under this section, which is intended to have broad application.

Mr. President, I do not think it is an exaggeration to describe S. 1437 as representing a major expansion of Federal criminal jurisdiction in ways which can limit the freedoms of Americans.

Most citizens tend to cooperate with Government. They would at first find life under a benevolent dictatorship essentially little different and perhaps even more orderly than the lives they now lead. But what of the uncooperative, cantankerous individualist. He or she would not fare well.

I strongly believe that much of our basic freedom exists because the Federal Government cannot always do what it wants to do—no matter how well motivated the intentions. S. 1437 asks for too much. It represents a vote of confidence in the discretion of our Federal law enforcement agencies at a time when they have yet to demonstrate that they have earned our confidence and trust after the disclosures of Watergate and of CIA-FBI abuses.

S. 1437 has been many years in the works. Time and effort have improved the bill and I think more work will result in more improvements. I have tried to do my part. Beginning with the bill's earlier version, S. 1, I publicly urged amendments to meet those provisions which constituted an official secrets act. I joined with our late colleague Phil Hart to prepare an amendment to substitute for the committee version of the espionage and related offenses chapter.

The distinguished floor manager, Senator KENNEDY, is to be commended for his diligence in seeking to cut out of S. 1437 those provisions which might limit first amendment rights. I was pleased to join him earlier in a colloquy further clarifying the intention of the committee to limit possible infringements on a free press and the free flow of information. I do think more can be done, however.

Senator KENNEDY also was very cooperative in working out an accommodation to accept my amendment that our Federal criminal law should be construed strictly. I have also cosponsored amendments offered by my colleagues to limit further the impact of the bill on the free expression of constitutional rights.

Progress in improving the bill has been made. More can be done. We can take chances with a housing or jobs bill. But we cannot and seldom do take chances on a national defense bill, and we should not on the criminal law either. Criminal law takes away freedom and prohibits conduct. We are not talking about street crime or coddling—muggers, robbers, rapists, murderers, violent criminals. My concerns are with those provisions which may directly affect ordinary citizens in their everyday working lives. These must be reworked so that they are more precisely aimed at the type of criminal activity sought to be punished.

In the strong hope that S. 1437 will be considered further and improvements will be made, I vote no.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, very shortly the Senate will vote on final passage of S. 1437. This event is a milestone in American jurisprudence.

For 200 years we have had, at the Federal level, an inadequate and outdated criminal code. For 11 years a massive effort has been underway to correct this situation.

Progress has been slow but the comprehensive nature of the bill demanded caution. We have now come to the point where the bill is acceptable to the overwhelming majority of Senators without regard to party or politics. A consensus has been achieved.

That consensus has not been easy to achieve. Over the past several days we have seen debated here virtually every area of the criminal law. Inevitably, in a bill so long and so encompassing, there are areas that each of us would object to if brought up as a separate legislation. At the same time, there are provisions that if brought up separately would have the support of this Senator but be objected to by others. These objections pale, however, in the face of the broad areas of agreement that have been forged during the last few days and weeks.

The result of this effort has been a bill which provides law enforcement officials with powerful new tools to combat criminal elements. Instead of crimes being defined in terms of the Federal jurisdiction, they are defined in common law terms. The old system proving Federal jurisdiction was confusing to juries and an unnecessary obstruction to prosecutors. S. 1437 is a great improvement.

The new code has uniform definitions and terms of culpability which bring clarity to the law while eliminating needless and repetitive litigation. It is written in clear, concise language so that everyone who deals with it will be able to dispense justice swiftly and fairly.

The code eliminates overlapping and duplicative sections reducing substantially the number of provisions in the Criminal Code without reducing the necessary coverage of the code.

Mr. President, the code deletes antiquated rules of evidence requiring two witnesses to establish perjury and corroboration of a rape victim's testimony.

At the same time that it enhances our ability to punish crimes, the code is extremely sensitive to the civil liberties of our citizens. It provides new protections for reporters subjected to illegal gag orders. It provides carefully drafted protections for the offender who is truly suffering from a mental disorder. It defines "obscenity" in terms approved by the Supreme Court so that all may know what is actually forbidden by the law.

I would be remiss at this point if I did not pay tribute to those who have labored so long and hard on the codification project. Senator McClellan and Senator Hruska who served on the Brown commission and presided over 4 years of hearings on the Criminal Code deserve a major share of the credit for keeping this work alive through years of controversy and development. Their devotion to this idea and the enormous effort they made to bring it to fruition are what made today's vote possible.

Senator Humphrey, along with Senator HATCH, joined the original sponsors, Senators KENNEDY and McClellan, last year to establish the effort as a genuinely nonpartisan one.

Senator KENNEDY deserves special praise for managing the bill with great skill and scrupulous fairness. His efforts to consider carefully the views of all Senators are to be commended, as well as the outstanding leadership provided during consideration of the bill.

I want to pay special tribute to the able and distinguished Senator from Alabama for his hard work on this bill. Throughout the deliberations on this measure on the Senate floor, the Senator from Alabama has served his country and the Senate well. His keen insights, observations, and analysis of the many provisions of this legislation have made a valauble contribution to the bill. I personally want to thank him for a job well done.

Mr. President, I must also extend my appreciation and thanks to Senator HATCH and Senator WALLOP, my distinguished colleagues on the Judiciary Committee. They were active in the committee on this measure and were equally supportive of efforts during consideration here on the Senate floor. Their assistance to me, as the Republican floor manager, was outstanding and most helpful. Again, I thank them both for their dedicated work and support.

Mr. President, other Senators on both sides of the aisle should be commended for their contributions to this new code. Many Senators and their staffs have worked closely and in a spirit of cooperation in achieving a bill worthy of passage by the U.S. Senate.

Mr. President, there should also be special thanks extended to staff members of the Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures of the Judiciary Committee. I want to thank Paul Summit, the subcommittee's chief counsel, Russell Coombs, its deputy chief counsel, and Eric Hultman, the minority counsel for their long hours of work over the past few weeks and months. I want to also thank Ken Feinberg of Senator KENNEDY's staff for his work on this measure.

Mr. President, the passage of this bill has been a bipartisan effort by both Senators and their staffs. The ability of our staffs to work closely together to resolve differences and work out amendments was most helpful in moving this measure along to final passage.

The Attorney General and his staff have also labored long and hard to seek a bill that is fair to all interests and they should be commended for their part in this legislation.

Mr. President, this is a historic moment and one of which we in the Senate can be justifiably proud as we send the bill to the House for consideration.

All of us, I believe, share the hope that the other body will move quickly but carefully and that the United States can have a modern criminal code in this Congress.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consetn that an article by Mr. James J. Kilpatrick, supporting passage of S. 1437, which appeared in the January 28, 1978, edition of the Washington Star, be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THIS RECODIFICATION BILL SHOULD PASS

The Senate came back to town on the 19th, and plunged swiftly into debate on one of the most important measures of this session. This is S. 1436, the bill to recodify the federal criminal code. After 12 years of patient labor, the time has come to push the bill to enactment.

Unhappily, the bill has provoked a kind of Pavlovian reaction on both right and left. Say "S. 1437" to some of my conservative friends, and their adrenals start pumping. At the other end of the spectrum, the American Civil Liberties Union is having the purple conniption fits; in a shameful display of ad hominem rhetoric, the ACLU denounces the bill because Richard Nixon and John Mitchell once had something to do with it.

For a time, it appeared that Jesse Helms of North Carolina was seeking to kill the bill by delaying it to death. He invoked Senate rules to prevent en bloc consideration of committee amendments. He was sore because he felt the leadership was trying to railroad a long and complicated bill to premature passage, and it may be that Majority Leader Robert Byrd erred in pressing too hard.

But in the end Helms relented and threw his own valued influence among conservatives into the cooperative effort. He is not happy with a number of provisions; he fears one result may be to clog the federal courts with appeals from state court convictions. I think his fears in this regard are overblown, but until we have a few years of experience, we won't know.

The point is that in a legislative field as controversial as this one, senators at the ends of opposition must give a little toward the center. This is not like a Panama Canal treaty, to be voted up or voted down with no opportunity for committees to do their work of refinement. In this matter of recodification, scores of interested parties have labored earnestly to rewrite the old Senate Bill One that raised such turmoil two years ago. In the process, an infinitely better bill has been perfected.

What is insufficiently understood is that virtually all of the most objectionable features of Senate Bill One have been eliminated from the measure emerging from the Senate. Within the Judiciary Committee, liberals and conservatives have struggled to reach agreements tolerable to both points of view.

These months of hard work have brought together such ordinary opposites as Kennedy of Massachusetts and Thurmond of South Carolina. We saw a yielding by the liberal Bayh of Indiana and the conservative Garn of Utah. Senators as far apart as Abourezk of South Dakota and the late John McClellan of Arkansas agreed to half loaves as better than none.

The sponsoring senators understand the pressing need to get a recodification law onto the books. The Federal Criminal Code is a patchwork proposition of conflicting and ambiguous statutes loosely stitched together over the course of 200 years. It cries out for orderly revision and modernization.

The bill would be justified for one reason alone: It would impose some sensible limitations upon the almost unlimited discretion of federal judges in imposing sentences on convicted defendants. It is simply bizarre that robbery, on the average, is punished by 39 months in prison in northern New York and by nearly 19 years in Texas. Substantially identical offenses by similarly situated defendants ought to result in fairly comparable punishments. That would seem to be elementary justice. The pending bill would take us in the right direction.

But there is much more in this bill that is good. Such stains on the Criminal Code as the old Smith Act would be removed entirely. The last vestigial remnants of the Comstock Act would be replaced by some rational provisions on pornography. We of the press would gain new protection against the unconstitutional gag orders of despotic judges.

This past Monday, in a healing gesture of statesmanship, Helms himself moved for adoption of 300 uncontested, perfecting amendments. If the same constructive approach can be obtained in the House, by the end of the year the task of recodification could be complete. Count it a milestone in our law, and let us get there soon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass?

Mr. KENNEDY. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

Mr. THURMOND. Yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass? The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. ABOUREZK), the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. ANDERSON), the Senator from Indiana (Mr. BAYH), the Senator from Florida (Mr. CHILES), the Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. DURKIN), the Senator from Alabama (Mr. SPARKMAN), and the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. STENNIS) are necessarily absent.

I also announce that the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. LONG) is absent because of illness.

On this vote, the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. ABOUREZK) is paired with the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. LONG). If present and voting, the Senator from South Dakota would vote "nay" and the Senator from Louisiana would vote "yea."

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. ANDERSON) would vote "yea."

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Nebraska (Mr. CURTIS), the Senator from Nevada (Mr. LAXALT), the Senator from Oregon (Mr. PACKWOOD), and the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. YOUNG) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Nebraska (Mr. CURTIS) would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 72, nays 15, as follows:

So the bill (S. 1437) was passed.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed as passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to make any necessary technical and clerical corrections in the engrossment of the Senate amendments to S. 1437.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill passed.

Mr. THURMOND. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, first of all, I thank my colleagues for the strong support they have shown in this vote on the recodification of the criminal code. I think this overwhelming vote constitutes a very firm commitment toward bringing some sense and order out of the chaotic current criminal code. Especially in the sentencing area we attempt to provide a degree of certainty, fairness, equity, and predictability which simply does not exist today.

I think it is a very clear indication to the American people that the Senate of the United States is strongly committed—on a bipartisan basis—to the goal of a modern criminal code. I am grateful for the support we received from the membership and from my colleagues on the Committee on the Judiciary.

I want, in particular, to thank the distinguished Senator from South Carolina (Mr. THURMOND), who has been a steadfast supporter of this legislation. He has been tireless in his pursuit of a fair consideration of this legislation, both during our markup period and again on the floor.

I thank the leadership for scheduling this legislation at an early time. I think we are all grateful to the majority leader (Mr. BYRD) and the minority leader (Mr. BAKER), since this bill is right on track in terms of the House of Representatives. It is going to take a good deal of work and effort in the House but I believe it would be tragic if this golden opportunity were lost. By indicating its will by a vote of 72–15, the Senate has served notice as to its concern; I hope and trust we can get similar favorable action in the House of Representatives. So I am grateful that the majority and minority leaders scheduled this bill as the first order of business.

With the days that we spent on S. 1437 and the hours that were spent by many Members of the Senate and their staffs on reviewing this complex bill, I think that, although it is highly complex and comprehensive, the Senate understood the magnitude of this legislation and the importance of it.

Mr. President, the vote this evening is a vindication of the extraordinary work of our former colleague and chairman of the Criminal Laws Subcommittee, Senator John McClellan, who had worked tirelessly with many members to fashion a compromise which would be in the national interest. I think, as has been stated here, that many of us, if we were drafting this legislation ourselves, would have changed many provisions. But as one who has had wiretap legislation before the Judiciary Committee for 9 years and has followed this debate for over a decade, I know some of the political realities. These adjustments, Mr. President, do not diminish the very, very important work exemplified by S. 1437. I think the bill is a substantial improvement over what we started with.

I am mindful of the work of the chairman of that committee, John McClellan; of Senator Hruska, who spent many days and hours on the issue of recodification; of Senator Philip Hart, who tragically left us a little over a year ago, and who was, I think, for all of us, the real conscience of the Senate in the area of individual rights and liberties.

He insisted that this legislation be a significant and substantial improvement over current law in the protection of individual liberties. We have, I believe, succeeded in that goal.

I thank the Brown Commission, and particularly Governor Brown who, even though he has no official responsibility in terms of the legislation, was never far from the barricades in wanting to be of help and assistance, tireless in the pursuit of this legislation. I note his work this evening.

Mr. President, it was not long ago that the Attorney General of the United States, Griffin Bell, during the consideration of his appointment before the Committee on the Judiciary, spoke very strongly about the importance of this legislation.

(Mr. CRANSTON assumed the chair.)

Mr. KENNEDY. He had a keen awareness of the importance of this legislation.

We are mindful of the strong commitment of Attorney General Bell, as well as the President concerning this recodification. It has been through the direct intervention of Attorney General Bell that S. 1437 has received such widespread, bipartisan support.

During the past few days there has been tucked away here in the Capitol a number of Justice Department staff. Ron Gainer, who has been of great help. No matter how excited or emotional any of us got during the consideration of S. 1437, Ron was always cool, an encyclopedia of knowledge about S. 1437. We are very grateful for his work.

He has been enormously helpful to all of us.

We, in the United States Senate, are dependent on the help and expertise of talented men and women. I think all of us are very fortunate in having that kind of assistance from the Justice Department. I think over the history of this country that the Justice Department has symbolized excellence it has been a goal of many, young and old alike, to serve there.

Roger Pauly, Fred Hess, Karen Skrivseth, Denis Hauptly, Richard Evans, Helen Jones and Christal Goode—all of them were tremendously helpful. The Attorney General has my deep thanks and appreciation.

I would also think, Mr. President, in mentioning John McClellan, that we mention his able right hand Paul Summit, who was absolutely invaluable to Senator McClellan and to all of us on the committee. I think we have all profited from his work, his understanding of the issues and his keen insight into criminal codes past and present. He has my personal thanks, as do Russell Coombs, Mabel Downey, and Shari Owens of the subcommittee.

I also want to pay special thanks to Eric Hultman, Senator THURMOND's assistant. He was as much a help to me as to Senator THURMOND. I am very grateful.

And a word of thanks to Michael Mullen of the Commerce Committee, formerly a key aide of Senator Philip Hart, who never lost his interest in the codification effort.

Finally, I am enormously grateful to my own administrative assistant, Kenneth Feinberg, who for so many years has been of tremendous assistance to me and to the committee. He performed yeoman service in fashioning—along with Paul, Senator McClellan and many others, including Senator THURMOND—the basic package which the Judiciary Committee moved forward to final passage.

I think all of us, perhaps, remember that it was not long ago that we all worked with a very distinguished former chief of staff of an important committee, Larry Woodworth, who subsequently went to the administration, and served that administration with distinction until he died. At his funeral, it was an important reminder—to me and I think to the other Members of the Congress who were there—of the extraordinary contribution that these men and women make to the legislative process.

It is extremely important, and I have certainly valued it and profited from it.

I am not going to take any more time to mention others, but the other members of the Judiciary Committee, and their very able staff all have my deepest thanks.

I just close with the very real hope that we can see early action in the House of Representatives and a short conference committee.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. THURMOND addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HODGES). The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise to express appreciation to the able majority leader for scheduling this bill, and for the fine cooperation he has given to us during its consideration.

I would also like to express appreciation to the able minority leader for the fine cooperation he has given us during the consideration of this bill.

The Senate is fortunate in having such able men as ROBERT C. BYRD and HOWARD BAKER to be the leaders here in the Senate, and we appreciate the splendid cooperation and assistance they have given us on this particular piece of legislation.

In my remarks before passage I paid tribute to Senator KENNEDY, Senators of the majority and the minority who were active in the legislation, and various staff members who were so helpful in the preparation of the legislation and during its consideration in the committee and on the floor of the Senate. I also paid tribute to the Attorney General and the Justice Department for the valuable help they gave in connection with the bill. I paid special tribute to the Senator from Alabama (Mr. ALLEN) for the active and beneficial role he played in consideration of the bill all the way through. Without the help of these people and many others this milestone legislation could not have been achieved.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, today the Senate has enacted what is without exaggeration truly landmark legislation.

Never before in the 200-year history of this Nation has the attempt even been made to systematically organize, revise and reform the Federal criminal laws so that they actually reflect as a body the needs and the values of the country.

Instead, our Federal criminal laws have grown up over the years in a haphazard random manner as a response to specific problems as they arose.

The result has been that those laws are often outdated and even inconsistent, thereby making more difficult rather than facilitating the administration of justice.

S. 1437 will change that. It will provide the people of this country with a system of laws that will be both coherent and rational. It will permit individual liberties while at the same time enabling each citizen to feel more secure in both his person and his property.

Mr. President, on what is certainly a momentous occasion, it is only appropriate to state for the RECORD that the passage of the Criminal Code Reform Act of 1978 could not have happened today without the efforts of four Senators: our late, departed colleague Senator John L. McClellan and our former colleague Senator Roman Hruska and the two distinguished managers of the bill, Senator KENNEDY and Senator THURMOND.

As all Members of the Senate are well aware, both Mr. McClellan and Mr. Hruska were in the forefront of this effort.

Both originally served as members of the Commission on Reform of Federal Criminal Laws. It was this commission that served as the genesis of the Criminal Code Act. Both of these Senators presided over years of hearings in their effort to obtain the goal of codification; but even all these efforts would have been for naught were it not for the labors of the managers of the bill, the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY) and the distinguished Senator from South Carolina (Mr. THURMOND), who have themselves been interested and actively involved in the attempt to codify the criminal laws for years.

Few bills have involved more controversial or emotional issues than has the criminal code. Its enactment could never have been achieved without their expertise and their willingness to make appropriate compromises on matters where their philosophies may have differed. For the sake of the greater goal of codification, thanks to their efforts and to their skillful management, the Nation will have a body of criminal laws that will be more understandable to the people, will better meet the needs of our judicial system, and will facilitate rather than hamper the organization of justice. So that these men deserve great commendation for their achievement.

I share the hope that has been expressed by Mr. KENNEDY that the House of Representatives will move expeditiously to consider this matter and to enact it into law, so that it may be sent to the President's desk during this session of Congress.

On this subject, I already have spoken to the Speaker of the House of Representatives at least twice, alerting him to the fact that the Senate was considering this important and complex bill and expressing the hope that the House would be able to move forward in this session so that this great effort by these two Senators who have managed the bill and the efforts by Mr. McClellan and Mr. Hruska will not have been lost. The Speaker of the House indicated a desire to move ahead with the bill on his side of the Hill; and I express the deep hope and will continue to urge that the House act on that bill as expeditiously as possible, so that it may be sent to the President's desk and signed into law.

The Senate is in the debt of these men. I personally express my own deep gratitude to them, and I salute them.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I join the distinguished majority leader in paying my respects and extending my compliments to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts and the equally distinguished Senator from South Carolina, who have acted so diligently, so skillfully, so carefully, and with such patience to bring about this legislative synthesis. As a Senator who practiced law for 17 years, I have some appreciation, I believe, for the complexity of the task and the difficulty of its attainment.

Codification of this code will mark a milestone in the further evolution and development of American jurisprudence. I believe it will extend still further the rights and indeed the duties, the responsibilities, and the protections of every American citizen in a solid foundation of justice in government.

I reiterate my special tribute to the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, the ranking member of the Judiciary Committee. I appreciate his long hours on the floor, his incisive debate, his efforts on behalf of the passage of this monumental piece of legislation.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, we have just completed action of a historic nature. For over 10 years, we have struggled to modernize Federal criminal statutes.

The effort has been controversial and complex. Without the dedication and leadership of Senator KENNEDY and our colleagues on the Judiciary Committee, past and present, this important task would never have been completed.

Compromises have necessarily resulted. Certainly the bill we passed today does not entirely reflect my viewpoint. But in any undertaking of this scope, there are bound to be disagreements over particulars. Senator KENNEDY has been a catalyst in bringing the diverse viewpoints of this body together to resolve their differences.

In his work on this legislation and his able management of this bill, Senator KENNEDY has performed an important service for the country that will long be remembered and I commend the distinguished floor manager.

HISTORY OF THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE, SCIENCE, AND TRANSPORTATION

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, on behalf of Mr. PELL, I send to the desk a resolution which has been cleared all around, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 372) authorizing the Printing of a recent history of the Senate Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation as a Senate Document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, on behalf of Mr. PELL, I send to the desk a statement by Mr. PELL in explanation of the resolution, and I ask unanimous consent that the statement be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

STATEMENT BY MR. PELL

Mr. PELL. The resolution which I have submitted provides for the printing as a Senate Document of a brief history of the Senate Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation on the thirtieth anniversary of the committee reforms instituted by the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946. I am confident that this document will serve as a valuable historical resource.

The publication of this document seems to be particularly appropriate at this time. As Senators know, Senator Magnuson has now relinquished the Chairmanship of the Committee to assume the Chairmanship of the Committee on Appropriations. In his 23 years of service as Chairman of the Committee, which is the longest consecutive service as a committee chairman in the history of the Senate, and over 30 years as a member of the Committee, Senator Magnuson has proven to be a strong and effective leader. During the 17 years that I have served in the Senate, I have worked closely with Senator Magnuson to preserve and develop our ocean resources, an issue of great concern to both of us. His dynamic leadership in this area has led to the passage of such landmark bills as the Coastal Zone Management Act, the Marine Mammal Protection Act, and the Fisheries Conservation and Management Act.

The Commerce Committee has also been in the forefront of legislative developments in such other areas as consumer protection, transportation, and communications. The last thirty years have been a dynamic period and the Commerce Committee has continuously provided the nation with responsive and innovative leadership.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution. The resolution was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed as a Senate document a compilation of materials relating to the history of the Senate Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation and its predecessor committees on the occasion of the thirtieth anniversary of the changes in committee structure commenced by the reforms of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946; and that there be printed for the use of that committee five thousand additional copies of such document.

EMPLOYMENT PREFERENCE FOR CERTAIN EMPLOYEES OF THE BUREAU OF INDIAN AFFAIRS AND THE INDIAN HEALTH SERVICE

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 561, which I understand has been cleared on the other side of the aisle.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 666) to allow Federal employment preference to certain employees of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, and to certain employees of the Indian Health Service, who are not entitled to the benefits of, or who have been adversely affected by the application of, certain Federal laws allowing employment preference to Indians, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I rise only to say that this item, Calendar No. 561, has been cleared on this calendar, and we have no objection to its passage.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Governmental Affairs with an amendment to strike all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, S. 666 is a bill which I introduced on February 10, 1977, with the cosponsorship of Senators BURDICK, DOMENICI, MARK O. HATFIELD, MCGOVERN, ABOUREZK, GRAVEL, BARTLETT, MELCHER, BELLMON, and SCHMITT. Hearings were held before the Civil Service and General Services Subcommittee on September 10, 1977, at which time we heard supporting testimony from several witnesses, including my eminent colleague, Senator PETE DOMENICI. Recommended changes were made in the bill, and it was ultimately approved, unanimously, by the Governmental Affairs Committee on December 15, 1977.

In a nutshell, this bill has two basic and vital objectives. First, it would provide a fair and equitable retirement formula to encourage the early retirement of non-Indians within the Bureau of Indian Affairs and the Indian Health Service. I hasten to add that this is not a windfall formula, but one that is carefully designed to compensate non-Indian career employees, who for reasons I will explain have been trapped in these agencies without any hope of promotion or opportunity to develop their full career potential. Second, the bill will take a major step in the direction of attaining the laudable and long-sought goals of Indian self-determination and Indian preference within the Bureau of Indian Affairs and the Indian Health Service.

We have been working with various versions of this legislation since the 93d Congress and it has evolved to the point where I am convinced we now have a bill that is well designed to deal with this very difficult problem. In handling this legislation during this Congress, we have worked closely with the Select Committee on Indian Affairs and I am glad to say we have their reassurance and support in helping secure passage of this bill. Before I get too far, however, I think it would be appropriate to provide some background on the historical facts that have brought about the need for this bill.

The Wheeler-Howard Act, passed in 1934, provided for radical reform of the administration of Indian affairs. Among its farsighted goals was preferential hiring of Indians into the Bureau of Indian Affairs and the application of Indian preference and subsequent promotions within the Bureau. For a number of reasons, the Department of Interior did not totally enforce Indian preference as it was intended in Wheeler-Howard. As a result, non-Indians developed their civil service careers in the Bureau of Indian Affairs and the Indian Health Service, and these non-Indians were assured that they would be accorded all of the benefits available to any other civil servant under normal civil service merit principles.

Times, however, have changed. Indians have become dissatisfied and have discovered their rights to promotional preference and have claimed these as clear Indian rights under the law. In addition, there are now large numbers of educated and trained Indians, well qualified to fill the positions which have, up until now, been held by non-Indians. As a result, there is now a concerted effort in the direction of total application of Indian self-determination and Indian preference.

In 1974, the issue culminated in the Mancari against Morton decision, where the U.S. Supreme Court unanimously upheld the application of Indian preference in all of its aspects, as embodied in Wheeler-Howard. The result has been that 3,000 to 4,000 non-Indian employees of the Bureau of Indian Affairs and Indian Health Service have been told, in effect that they no longer have any meaningful career potential in either agency. As a direct result of the inconsistencies in enforcement of the Indian preference law, the promotion and reassignment prospects of many Indian and non-Indian employees have been seriously impaired. Understandably, this situation has caused serious morale and management problems which have limited the efficient operation of these two agencies and the delivery of vital services to Indian people. Every possible solution has been attempted, including out-placement, and nothing has worked.

In light of these developments it is my view that the only fair approach is to give non-Indian employees the opportunity to relinquish their jobs with dignity, pride, and self respect, and have a pension that reflects the fact that such employees, through no fault of their own, have no decent career advancement opportunities. In doing that, we would also be encouraging the full realization of the principles of Indian self-determination and Indian preference.

S. 666 has been tailored to provide the necessary inducement to encourage the early retirement of many, if not most, non-Indian employees of the Bureau of Indian Affairs. Such action is fair and equitable in view of the difficulties endured by many of these individuals, and I commend the Committee on Governmental Affairs and particularly the Subcommittee on Civil Service and General Services for dealing with this very difficult problem. I urge all Senators to vote for this vital and necessary bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

NUTRITION PROBLEMS IN LATIN AMERICA

HON. PAUL SIMON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 30, 1978

Mr. SIMON. Mr. Speaker, the Chicago Tribune has launched an unusual and substantial series of articles on South America.

In the opening salvo of stories was a small one entitled: "Malnutrition Is Always on the Menu," written by Ronald Yates.

I call it to the attention of my colleagues because soon we are going to have to make decisions which will affect the lives of many who are in desperate need.

No. 1 KILLER: MALNUTRITION IS ALWAYS ON THE MENU

(By Ronald Yates)

"He dies as an old man before 30.
He dies of violence before 20.
He dies of hunger a little bit every day."
Joao Cabral de Melo Neto, Brazilian poet.

LIMA, PERU.—Dolores Bravo Herlinda reached down and shoved her dark brown fingers into the soft clay outside her reed and mud shack. She lifted the grey soil up to her face and put her lips to it.

"This is what my children eat when I am not watching—they eat it to fill their bellies because sometimes I run out of rice and beans," she said. "I think their minds are dying because sometimes they only sit and stare and say nothing."

Like the 200,000 other squatters who have staked out a few square feet of land in Via El Salvador, a barrio 30 minutes south of Lima, Dolores Bravo is engaged in a constant fight for survival.

"Every day children die here and we carry them up on that hill and we bury them," she said, nodding toward a barren mound of earth dotted with tiny wood crosses. "We have no coffins, so we wrap their bodies in old linen. Sometimes someone donates a shroud or an old trunk. And we lower them into the same clay that killed them.

"So far my children are still alive," she said, gathering her six children, who range in age from 2 to 9, around her. "I hope God will spare them for a while."

It is a hope which echoes over the vast tableau of South America, from the tips of the towering Andes to the jungles of Peru and Brazil, to the altiplano of Bolivia to the pampas of Argentina.

But it is a blind hope, for hunger—even more than human rights violations, inflation, and wobbly governments—is South America's most serious problem.

Hunger is a spectre over the land. It is everywhere. Children gone blind because of a lack of Vitamin A beg on the streets of South America's capitals; other children, their bodies stunted and crippled by lack of nutrition, drag themselves along sidewalks in search of fresh garbage to eat.

In Brazil's northeast, they eat sugar cane or drink sugar juice, which provides energy, but no nutrition.

In the Andes of Peru and Bolivia, children and adults chew coca leaves to kill the hunger pangs.

In Bogota, Colombia, children run down and beat to death cats and dogs in order to add some meat to a diet mostly of beans.

From one end of South America to the other, governments admit malnutrition is the No. 1 killer of their people; the prime crippler of minds and bodies in nations where healthy minds and bodies are in short supply.

"One of our greatest problems is the proportion of children suffering from malnutrition with all its physical and intellectual consequences," said Venezuelan President Carlos Andres Perez. "Without question, this is the most serious problem in South America."

At the other end of the South American continent, the military junta of Chile agrees.

"In Chile right now we have thousands of children suffering from third-degree malnutrition," said Gen. Gustavo Leigh Guzman, one of the four generals in Chile's rightist military junta.

"But we are doing something about it, which is more than the previous regime [that of leftist President Salvador Allende, deposed in 1973] did," he said.

While Chile's move to help its undernourished thousands may be the first of its kind in all of South America, it is still barely making a dent among the estimated half million hungry people who surround Santiago, the nation's sprawling capital.

"Two years ago I had five children," said Thelia Ojeda, hunkering down in front of her tarpaper shack on the outskirts of Santiago. "Today I have two. The other three died. Two died in their sleep, but the third died with foam on his mouth. The doctor said he went crazy with hunger. I shall never forget his suffering. His blood is on the hands of all Chileans who walk the streets with fat bellies."

In Brazil and other South American countries often cited for human rights violations, people are desperately trying to focus the world's attention on the problem of hunger instead of political repression.

"Torture is only one side of human rights," said Paulo Cardinal Arns, archbishop of Sao Paulo, Brazil. "The worst part is that we have such bad salaries for our people that they can't afford to feed themselves. As a result thousands of children are dying in the first year of their lives. This is much more important than one case of human rights violation."

In the favelas or slums of Rio de Janeiro the basic diet is rice with bean water and almost never meat.

Near Recife, Brazil, Jose Consalves, 50, has raised three sons on a salary of 65 cents a day, picking cotton and corn for rich landowners.

Near Salvador, Brazil, Lina Capistano de Amor, 54, weighs sugar cane cut by laborers who earn about 40 cruzeiros [$2.75] a day. Most cutters, he says, have 5 to 10 children. How do they live?

"God must give," he shrugs. "And they eat the cane."

In eastern Bolivia 90 per cent of all children have parasites which thrive in bad water, or hookworms.

As in most villages in Peru and Bolivia, people live in mud huts with pigs and chickens. The result is a high rate of dysentery and other diseases.

"In the town of Vila Bandeirande in northeastern Brazil 76 per cent of all children under 5 suffer from malnutrition," said Heraldo Souto Maior, a sociology professor at the University of Recife.

"Because of this malnutrition, the children suffer anemia or blindness and have hardly any resistance to the most basic diseases."

In rural areas of Bolivia, Peru, and Ecuador only about 4 per cent of the people have drinkable water within a mile of their homes. Only 2 per cent have sanitary facilities—the rest simply use roadbeds or streams from which other people draw their cooking and drinking water.

"My life is miserable," said Dolores Bravo, kicking at the damp clay which covered the ground like a huge wet slate. "But it is the only life I have and I am going to make sure my children survive—even if I have to teach them to steal to do it."

THE BWCA—A WILDERNESS WELL SUITED TO USE BY THE ELDERLY AND HANDICAPPED

HON. DONALD M. FRASER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 30, 1978

Mr. FRASER. Mr. Speaker, it has been alleged that my bill to bring full wilderness protection to the Boundary Waters Canoe Area would prevent the handicapped, senior citizens, and the less physically able from using the area. This is a serious concern, but one I feel does not hold up under close examination. In fact, the BWCA is a wilderness ideally suited for use by members of these groups. Whereas most western wilderness areas demand hiking and climbing that is difficult or impossible for the less-than-hardy, the BWCA lakes allow a person's weight to be borne in a canoe for all or much of a trip. Additionally, paddling is extremely healthful and need not be overly strenuous. Rough water can present problems, but such problems would face any BWCA traveler and can be met by waiting on shore for conditions to improve.

To remove the lakes on the BWCA's periphery from the wilderness, as Congressman OBERSTAR's bill would do, would only make access to the wilderness more difficult for the elderly and handicapped. Were these lakes placed in a national recreation area, a person would have no choice but to travel across lakes and portages simply to enter the wilderness. Under my bill, a wilderness experience would be available immediately upon entering the canoe country.

I would like to call my colleagues' attention to a recent letter to the editor of the Minnesota Daily. Written by Alan Watson, the letter is an incisive statement of the issues that lie at the heart of the argument over access to the area. Watson observes:

The handicapped are no different from the rest of us . . . To assume that only people with motors or hearty people need the solitude and peace of the true wilderness is a terrible injustice—a slam against the recreational and spiritual needs of all people.

The letter follows:

[From the Minnesota Daily, Jan. 3, 1978]

PERIPHERAL CONCERNS

(By Alan L. Watson)

There is legitimate concern that the Fraser bill (H.R. 2820), which restricts motorboats from the entire 1-million-acre Boundary Waters Canoe Area (BWCA), is discriminatory against the handicapped, senior citizens and the less physically able. Rep. Oberstar, whose competing bill (H.R. 8722) would reduce the wilderness by 40 percent and allow logging and motorized recreation, feels that his bill ensures that everyone will have access to the BWCA.

Just the opposite is true. The Fraser bill provides maximum wilderness recreational opportunities for the handicapped, the seniors and the less physically able and ensures that all people have the same options, regardless of physical health or age.

The handicapped are no different from the rest of us, who are not always more healthy overall. To assume that only people with motors or hearty people need the solitude and peace of the true wilderness is a terrible injustice—a slam against the recreational and spiritual needs of all people.

The Fraser bill ensures that the entire BWCA is managed as wilderness—not just interior zones that only the strong and healthy can reach after days of strenuous canoeing and portaging. In Fraser's bill, all entry points along the periphery will have full wilderness status and be immediately accessible to those very groups who must not be denied access to the wilderness.

Hence, the Oberstar bill actually reduces opportunities for all people by turning the periphery of the BWCA into a recreational area resembling those already available throughout the state, denying access to the primeval wilderness to those very people he is only superficially concerned about.

It is inexcusable to assume that those less physically able do not want the options available to the rest of us.

UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

HON. JAMES J. BLANCHARD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 25, 1978

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, January 22 marked the 60th anniversary of the Proclamation of Independence of Ukraine, the largest non-Russian captive nation.

Although the Ukrainian nation had less than 4 years of independence before being overpowered by Russian forces and coerced into the Soviet Union, the Ukrainian people have never given up their struggle for freedom.

For 60 years, the Soviets have attempted to erase each aspect of a separate Ukrainian nation—its church, its universities, its art and literature, its government, even the people themselves. Yet this "fusion" of Ukraine has not succeeded, because of the strength of the 50 million Ukrainians around the world.

Today, the work of the group of dissidents monitoring Soviet compliance with the human rights provisions of the Helsinki accords offers fresh testimony to the spirit of the Ukrainians. But their struggle is not over. The Soviet arrest—less than 1 year ago—of two members of that monitoring group, Mykola Rudenko and Oleksa Tykhy, is only further evidence, if any is needed, of the true policies of the Soviet Union regarding human rights.

I believe we have a responsibility to say "no" to Soviet repression. Our Nation has long been a symbol of liberty and justice, and we have a responsibility to reach out beyond that symbolism, with our actions and policies. The lack of freedom for any nation ultimately diminishes our own, and so we stand side by side with the Ukrainians in their struggle.

I have joined with other Congressmen in recent months to make clear to the Soviet Union our determination to make human rights an unbending priority. I believe these actions give very real support to those working for human rights within Ukraine and in other captive nations. We will continue to speak out.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to join my colleagues in observing the 60th anniversary of Ukrainian Independence Day.

A PROGRAM WHOSE TIME WILL COME

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

Monday, January 30, 1978

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, over the past decade or so we have heard a great deal about the need for land use planning and land use controls. A number of laws have been promoted, or enacted at the local, State, and Federal level to deal with a variety of land use issues. Today, more than ever, we have the need for effective and comprehensive land use management. The area most in need of protection, largely because of our failure to act in the past, is prime agricultural lands.

The State of California has for several years attempted to enact an agricultural land conservation law, only to lose the crucial vote by a narrow margin in the State legislature. One of the key authors of that legislation was Charles Warren, now Chairman of the President's Council on Environmental Quality. Other knowledgeable and committed individuals are now members of the Carter administration, and in a position to contribute to the development of a sane Federal land use policy. Today, in California the need to control the spread of urban developments away from prime agricultural land is urgent. Cities all over the State are enacting ad hoc growth management policies that are frequently too little and too late. Only a comprehensive approach will succeed in both preserving prime agricultural lands, and helping urban development programs that benefit the maximum number of people. The public supports such programs now; it is only a matter of time before the legislatures of this land, including the Congress, respond.

The White House Conference on Balanced National Growth and Economic Development, which begins today, should be discussing the relationship between urban growth policies, and agricultural growth policies. An urban development strategy could, and should be consistent with an agricultural land preservation strategy. There is no fundamental reason why these two important growth policies should be in conflict.

Mr. Speaker, at this time I insert the California poll on land use controls in the RECORD.

The item follows:

[From The Enterprise (Riverside, Calif.) Jan. 20, 1978]

CALIFORNIA POLL: PUBLIC FAVORS LAND CONTROLS

(By Mervin D. Field)

In a sharp reversal of the public mood which generated this state's housing boom of the 1950s and '60s, the public today overwhelmingly favors stricter control of "urban spread."

The California Poll found in a recent survey that the public clearly considers farmland protection to have the highest priority.

When asked whether they believe there is still plenty of land left in California for both farms and people, or whether the spread of cities needs to be controlled, only one out of four persons felt there is "plenty of land for both." Nearly three out of four say they favor controlling the spread of cities:

	Percent
Plenty of land for both farms and people	24
Spread of cities needs to be controlled	71
No opinion	5

What about the American dream of a house, a yard and wide open spaces that fueled California's surburban boom of the last generation? Would people really favor slowing urban growth if it meant fewer houses in suburbs and the country? When offered the choice, a large majority of Californians—84%—agree that California should keep as much of its productive land in food-growing as possible, even if it means building fewer houses in suburbs or the country.

In response to a series of trade-off questions, farming is preferred by the public nearly eight to one over housing (82% to 11%) and industry (80% to 12%), and by almost four to one over parks and recreation (73% to 19%).

Timber production also takes precedence over parks and recreation in the responses, but by the smaller margin of 50% to 40%.

Government controls which would prohibit housing and industrial growth in prime agricultural areas drew support among those polled by a two to one margin, 64% to 32%.

Tax breaks for farmers who agree to keep their land in production, as provided by the 1965 Land Conservation Act, also drew strong support, 86% to 11%. Those tax breaks should have strings attached, those polled said (83% to 12%), restricting the right of farmers to develop their land after receiving tax breaks.

Most Californians agree (80% to 16%) that one way to slow urban sprawl would be to arrest the deterioration of the inner cities, making the quality of city life more attractive to middle-class people.

The task of rebuilding the cities toward that end should be supported with state and federal tax monies, a substantial majority (70% to 25%) agreed.

COMMEMORATIVE STAMP HONORING GENERAL PULASKI

HON. RONALD M. MOTTL

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 30, 1978

Mr. MOTTL. Mr. Speaker, today, I am introducing a bill to provide for the issuance of a commemorative postage stamp in honor of General Pulaski, a Polish patriot and Revolutionary soldier, to whom generations of Americans have paid homage for his devotion to the American cause of independence. Even though he died before he could taste the sweetness of America's victory, his contribution was fundamental to the struggle. General Pulaski, his spirit, dedication and commitment to the ideals of liberty and the rights of the individual, surely has become a model to us all.

And as we honor General Pulaski, we are also paying tribute to the millions of Americans of Polish descent, who have upheld the legacy of this valiant general in continuing to make significant contributions to our country.

So, in salute to Gen. Casimir Pulaski and to the indefatigable zeal of Polish Americans, I submit this bill for congressional consideration and approval.

HEW IGNORES LEGISLATIVE INTENT

HON. HENRY J. HYDE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 30, 1978

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, the word "outrageous" seems somehow inadequate to describe the regulations issued on January 26, 1978, through HEW Secretary Joseph H. Califano designed to implement the law respecting Federal funding of abortions. If ever a case in point can be made for regulatory reform, this is it. The legislative intent of the law as finally passed on December 7, 1977, can most authoritatively be determined from the person who authored the amendment, Congressman ROBERT MICHEL, of Illinois. It is clear that his views as expressed in debate and correspondence with Secretary Califano have been totally ignored.

Anyone familiar with the extensive floor debates on this issue ought to have reasonably concluded that very tight regulations were called for which would prevent abuse by abortion practitioners. Instead, HEW issued the weakest regulations possible, inviting massive fraud and providing no protection whatever to prenatal life. The regulations have effectively cancelled the amendment, which sought to protect preborn human life insofar as medicaid abortions are concerned. The HEW regulations, I predict, will result in 100,000 or more federally funded abortions this year. Lest these figures seem too partisan, the Washington Star noted on January 26, 1978:

> On almost every key point in dispute about what Congress had meant in the new law, the regulations are closer to the liberal view held generally in the Senate than to the strongly conservative view that prevailed in the House.

In other words, the regulations are not even remotely a "compromise."

Those who advocate permissive abortion were delighted by the regulations. The Religious Coalition for Abortion Rights described the regulations as "compassionate and fair." As someone has noted "when the religious Coalition for Abortion Rights calls an abortion law 'compassionate and fair,' you had better count on a lot of babies dying."

Particularly outrageous is the 60-day reporting requirement following rape or incest. I hope in our further negotiations concerning the Panama Canal Treaty that "prompt passage" of our ships through the canal in time of emergency means sooner than 60 days. The amendment as passed by Congress requires prompt reporting of rape or incest. Apparently the word "prompt"—not to be confused with any reasonable dictionary definition—means two months to the regulators at HEW.

The Carter/Califano regulations emasculate the law in at least the following ways:

First. They interpret the words "medical procedure" to include abortions despite the fact that those offering the final language said on the House floor that they did not. If the term "abortion" were meant to apply to treatment following rape, the amendment would have said so. "Medical procedure" is clearly treatment of a far less drastic nature than abortion and a reasonable reading of the amendment in question requires this distinction;

Second. They fail to require any documentation that a preexisting or present health problem warrants an abortion under the "life of the mother" or "severe and long-lasting physical health damage" exceptions. Only a physician's signed certificate of need is required. And physicians have been assured by a high-ranking official at HEW that checking up on "fraud" would not include second-guessing of doctors' medical decisions, by either State or Federal officials—Washington Star, January 27, 1978;

Third. An abortion clinic physician can certify the need for an abortion after performing the abortion under the "life" exception. Under the health exception, two abortion clinic physicians, who may be coworkers, can certify the need, after one of them performs the abortion;

Fourth. Any pregnant young woman, if her age falls within the provisions of her State's law on statutory rape, is eligible for a federally funded abortion;

Fifth. Also, under the rape and incest exception, reporting of the incident of rape—statutory as well as forced—may be done by anyone, after the abortion has been performed, as long as the report is made within 60 days of the incident. The report can be made by mail and only the rape victim's name is required; no address is necessary. Consequently, a woman can go to an abortion clinic, tell the receptionist she has been raped, get an abortion and afterward the receptionist need only send the woman's name to a law enforcement agency or public health facility—a public health facility may be a public hospital that has a permissive policy on abortion.

We know from years of experience with State abortion statutes that if abortion-physicians are not required by law to actually document the need for abortions, they will abuse the law, in some instances massively. Secretary Califano has required no such accountability. Furthermore, women need only claim that they were the victims of a statutory or forced rape or incest; no additional accountability is required of them.

The regulations have made a mockery of the legislative intent of Congress and have nullified the persistent efforts of a majority of the House of Representatives. Far from contributing to any spirit of compromise on this issue, the regulations have underscored the impossibility of compromise and will fuel further controversy not only in Congress but throughout the Nation.

REDS ON THE BLUE MEDITERRANEAN

HON. BOB WILSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 30, 1978

Mr. BOB WILSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

[From the Washington Star, Jan. 26, 1978]

Letters to the editor

REDS ON THE BLUE MEDITERRANEAN

The fall of the Italian government could signal peril ahead for the fragile fabric of the free world. Italy, a stalwart member of NATO, makes a major contribution to the security of Southern Europe and to its soft underbelly, the Mediterranean. The Italian navy, for example, presently shares with the U.S. Navy key responsibilities in keeping that body of water a relatively peaceful lake.

The large and growing Soviet naval presence in the area, coupled with the withdrawal of the British and our own increasingly strained naval resources, makes Italian support all the more valuable. Further, if it weren't for the availability of Italian port facilities, we would not be able to maintain anywhere near the peace-keeping presence there that we do now. The critically important stabilizing presence of the Sixth Fleet during the 1973 Middle East war would not have been possible without our use of these ports.

For one reason or another, most other Mediterranean ports have been closed to us, and the potential loss of Italian ports or, indeed, any weakening of Italy's NATO resolve and cooperation as a result of Communist influence within their government would be cataclysmic to the West.

The makeup of the new Italian government will thus be watched with greater than usual interest in the West. Southern Europe or, to be more precise, Latin Southern Europe, is faced with an inexorable advance of Communist parties from within. In Italy, France and Spain, Communist parties owe much of their success to their promise to build a different kind of Communist society, one more human than those in Eastern Europe, and independent of Moscow. Their leaders have repeatedly professed attachment to the principles of democracy and independence, have publicly criticized the repression of human rights in East European Communist countries and have promised that each Communst party has the right to decide on all internal matters without Moscow's interference.

Even if we don't question their sincerity, the real question is whether they can keep their promises once in power.

Let's take a closer look at the history of communism. Most Communist parties have started their political growth in "alliance" with other "progressive forces" in an attempt to solve some crucial national issue, usually to form a government. The next step is to share power in a government of "national unity," followed by a coup that leaves the Communists as the sole government.

The Communist moderate leaders of this first period are inevitably overthrown by hard-liners who accuse the former of weakness towards capitalism. The party is purged, bringing to the top those demanding "ideological purity." "Workers" and "peasants" replace intellectuals in key party positions. The terror begins: actual and potential opponents are physically exterminated, especially the moderate members of the Communist party. All revolutions must first devour their young.

One might argue that while this happened in Russia in 1917 (years later Kerensky, himself, told me how this process worked in his case) and in Eastern Europe in the late 1940s, times have changed. Not true. Look at the recent "national emergency" governments in South Vietnam and Cambodia in the transition period. The Communists first used representatives of churches and the bourgeoisie to gain their goals, then purged them all and even cracked down on the social categories that their former allies represented.

What this all means is that even if present Southern European Communist leaders were sincere in their desire to avoid the classical form of repressive communism, they would probably not be able to do so because of the unavoidable mechanics of the system.

It should be clear that the independence of Communist countries towards Russia is imperfect and most temporary, while their sense of solidarity to Communist doctrine is constant. We should not underestimate the importance of their sharing a Communist ideology—they speak the same language. And there is also an emotional element: whatever differences exist, Russia remains the mother Communist country, and Moscow a Mecca for all Communists. Russian help will always be the preferred option to losing political power, because a pro-Moscow faction will always exist in any Communist party.

The recent very commendable statement by our State Department decrying Communist participation in the Italian government has been received with mixed feelings in Europe, and questions have been raised about our right to express opinions concerning momentous events in other countries. Like it or not, the fact remains that the United States is the main economic and military power in the free world, upon whose strength so many countries now depend. But we, too, depend on them. We cannot for long disregard what happens in other parts of the world. Embattled democratic forces in Southern Europe, under threat of communism, wait, ever long, for our support.

Finally and more particularly, what these critics overlook is that we and Italy are members of a fundamental alliance and that the question of Communist participation in the government of an alliance member impinges directly on the solidarity and future of that alliance. The toleration shown by the democratic world to fascism in the 1930s led to the Second World War. We learned a bitter lesson the hard way. Let's not make the same mistake again.

SKAGIT RIVER LEVEE IMPROVEMENT PROJECT

HON. LLOYD MEEDS

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 30, 1978

Mr. MEEDS. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced legislation which would modify the Flood Control Act of 1966 in regard to the Skagit River levee and channel improvements project which is located in Skagit County, Wash., in my district.

The current authorization provides for raising and strengthening existing levees downstream from Burlington, Wash., in the vicinity of Interstate 5 bridge to the river's mouth and minor channel improvements to increase channel capacities. Also, this project will supplement the flood protection being provided by Puget Sound Power & Light Co.'s modified operation of their Upper Baker project.

Since authorization of the levee and channel improvement in 1966, extensive development has occurred in the Burlington-Sedro Woolley area upstream and it now appears to be necessary for flood protection in that area also. Flood protection studies should consider the improvement and extension of approximately 4 miles of levee from Burlington to the vicinity of Sedro Woolley as an integral part of the Skagit River levee and channel improvement project.

The legislation I have introduced will fine tune the authorization granted in 1966.

SOLAR POWER SATELLITE RESEARCH, DEVELOPMENT, AND DEMONSTRATION PROGRAM ACT OF 1978

HON. RONNIE G. FLIPPO

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 30, 1978

Mr. FLIPPO. Mr. Speaker, solar energy presents mankind with a great challenge and with great opportunities for the future. We have the challenge to find the means to harness the full potential of the Sun as an energy source. Our Nation has developed the essential technology through the space program which will enable us to explore the frontiers of solar energy. Collection of solar energy in space provides us with an energy source which has demonstrated great promise as a cost-efficient means of supplying future energy needs.

The potential of solar power satellites to meet energy demands deserves close scrutiny and complete study to assure that this energy source is available for our future. Collection of solar energy in space offers an environmentally sound, renewable energy source of great magnitude.
